MIKE SHERMAN

MIKE SHERMAN: A

BY LEE REMMEL
Editorial Director

Scholarly Michael Francis Sherman, who last January became the thirteenth head coach in the Green Bay Packers' lustrous history, is, quite clearly, a man with a plan.

In fact, by his own admission, he is a man of many plans—an approach described early on by a member of the Wisconsin sports media as “an ultra-organized management style.”

In any case, it is a highly-detailed agenda with which the imposing New Englander takes on the challenge of returning the Green and Gold to the playoffs in the NFL's 2000 season after a one-year hiatus, that an untoward 8-8 development in 1999 which ended a club-record string of six consecutive postseason appearances.

The possessor of a dry, understated sense of humor, Sherman facetiously responds to the “ultra-organized” description of his coaching approach by observing, “I think if you look at my desk, that's not always the case.”

“But I do feel like when we do things related to football that we have a plan for everything we do—from our meetings, our practices, how we travel and so forth.

“Whatever it is, we're going to have a plan. And I think with detailed organization—well thought out plans—that it creates an aura of confidence in players and coaches...and I think confidence is a necessary component of what it takes to be successful.

“Right from the beginning, I wanted to be organized, structured and disciplined,” he said, “both with the players and coaches. I want to generate a genuine concern with the team for each other. I think that it is important that the chemistry factor on our team is where it should be in order for us to have success.

“Loyalty, trust and respect are the other things I've talked to our players about an awful lot, and I think if we can get those characteristics to become a part of who we are, the chemistry issue should take care of itself.”

Yet, though committed to structured organization and precise plans, the 45-year-old Central Connecticut alumnus already has demonstrated that he will not be what he describes as “a textbook coach.”

Sherman, a former offensive lineman/linebacker as a collegian, made that abundantly clear during the team's fourth and final minicamp in June when he called a diversionary “audible,” taking his players on a surprise trip to a Green Bay bowling alley in lieu of that day's practice, enhancing the experience for his athletes by putting up $2,000 out of his own pocket as prize money.

“I'm not hesitant to try things that are different,” the Packers' field leader said in underscoring that departure from the standard camp regimen. “If something needs to be done that I think can help our football team at that time, I will do it. I realize you open yourself up to criticism sometimes, but my job is to address the needs of this team as I see them.

“No, I don't have anything up my sleeve right now,” he added, “but if the situation calls for it that we do something that may be out of the norm, and it would help our team be successful, we will do it.”

Elaborating on his impromptu decision to take his troops bowling, Sherman explained, “It was going to be our nineteenth (minicamp) practice, and my tradeoff there was simply that that was the fifth practice in a row in the fourth minicamp and I wanted to get three good days in in the last week (the one to follow), and I thought it was a good tradeoff. We were able to work on some things from a team and a chemistry standpoint. And I think by bowling that day we accomplished a lot. (And) we did get three great days in the next week and I think (because of the) benefits...if I had to do it again, I would do it again.”

Although he is in his first year as a head coach at any level—as was, for poetic comparison, 1992-98 predecessor Mike Holmgren when he arrived in Green Bay—he has let it be known from the outset that he feels equal to the challenge presented when Ron Wolf, the Packers' executive vice president and general manager, named him to succeed Ray Rhodes last January 18.

At his initial press conference that day, Sherman sprang his very first surprise by announcing to a capacity house in the Packers' media auditorium, “I'll answer your first question for you: ‘Yes, I am ready to be head coach of the Green Bay Packers.’”

Subsequently reflecting upon that moment as he looked to the season immediately ahead from the quiet order of his Lambeau Field office, he acknowledged, “I did say that...I feel very confident about the plan that I'm employing here with our team and our coaches...And maybe that gives me a certain comfort level with my present position as head coach."

Sherman, who said, "I've been preparing for this job for 21 years," referring to his experience at all levels of football coaching (high school, college and pro), is equally confident in the coaching staff he assembled with painstaking care.

"I think one of the most important duties I had as a head coach," the purposeful Northborough, Mass., native noted, "was to hire a staff. And I think that the criteria I set of talented coaches, great communicators and quality men has been met in every aspect thus far.

"After going through four minicamps, I can honestly say this is a very high quality staff—both on and off the field. They understand the responsibility they have, not just as coaches but also as people in the Green Bay community. And I think they know what their role is here as coaches for the Green Bay Packers and their responsibility to the fans."

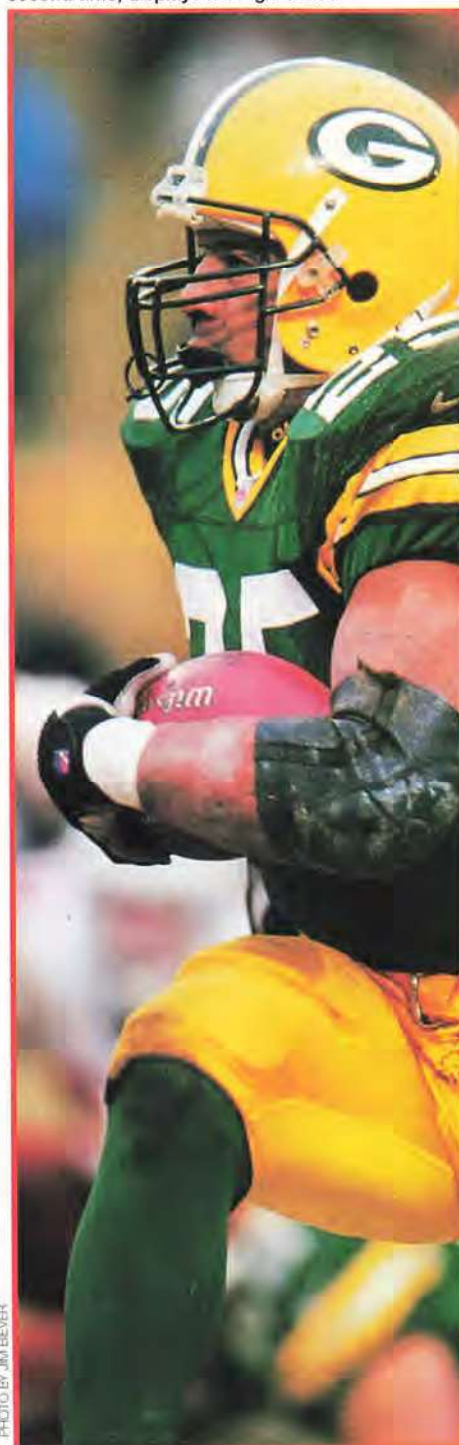

From the personal perspective, Sherman also is fully aware that he will be taking on a multifaceted role for the first time, which he concedes will be one of his greatest challenges in the season at hand.

"Having been an offensive coach my whole life, and now becoming a head coach, my focus now has to be three-fold: Offense, defense and special teams," he said. "That will be one of my challenges.

"The other one would be to try not to micro-manage. I have talented and efficient coaches and I need to allow them the opportunity to do what they can do best."

As might be expected, the Sherman offense will reflect his association with the "West Coast" version he had been exposed to as the Packers' tight end coach under Holmgren in 1997-1998 and as offensive coordinator for the Seattle Seahawks, also under Holmgren, last season.

"It will be very similar to what we've done here in the past," he said in addressing the subject. "There will be some subtle changes—as there were in Seattle—here and there. As defenses change, offenses have to change as well. But, for the most part, the basic part of this offense, what has been so successful in the past, will remain the same."

On the defensive side of the football, however, there is a dramatically different "look."

"I'm very excited about our defensive scheme," Sherman said in assessing the new approach, explaining, "After we (the Packers) got beat by Denver in the Super Bowl in '97, I did extensive study on their defense, and I became intrigued with the way that they played defense. I thought that scheme was something that I would like to use some day if I was ever a head coach. When I got this job, I felt that scheme was something that would benefit our personnel here.

"The nature of our defense will be very aggressive in its approach. It will employ an eight man front a majority of the time with an emphasis to present a numbers problem on offense in the run game, hopefully creating some confusion. Because of the multiple looks we will show and the blitz package we will utilize, I believe we can be equally effective against teams that pass the ball. You have to have a quality secondary and I believe we have the makings of one."

From the offensive perspective, Sherman takes obvious comfort in the knowledge that the key performers available to him have been accustomed to post-season success.

"We have key people in place on offense that participated in two Super Bowl seasons (1996 and 1997)," he noted. "When you have Brett Favre, Dorsey Levens, William Henderson, Earl Dotson, Antonio Freeman, Bill Schroeder, Frank Winters...we have players who have had some experience in playing in some big games.

"I think with the addition of some of our newer and younger players—added to the older veterans—we have the talent here to do what needs to be accomplished offensively."

Turning again to the other side of the football, Sherman said, "I believe we've upgraded our defense from last year. We have more speed (including ends John Thierry and David Bowens, acquired in the offseason). And I believe our style of defense—our scheme—will allow us to be a better team. As far as our front seven goes, I think we have the talent in there (veterans Santana Dotson and Vonnice Holliday and nose tackle Russell Maryland, signed as a free agent) that can play this scheme.

"The defense is a lot different than it used to be when I was here last time...and we had bigger front people....We don't have that size up front that we used to have, but we do have a tenacious style of defense and defenders that hopefully can make things happen.

"The linemen are quicker and faster than they used to be, and they're going to be moving a lot more. The linebackers will be more responsible for a specific gap, should be able to read and react more quickly. So the style of defense will change dramatically because it's an aggressive, up-field approach that will hopefully affect the rhythm of the football game and create turnovers and loss yardage.

"So, as far as talent level goes, offensively because of my familiarity with them, it's kind of what I expected," Sherman summed up.

"Defensively, we will have to wait and see if our scheme meshes with our players. I believe it will."

Aware that the club's special units represented the least effective part of the Packers' overall game in 1999, Sherman has made special teams a high priority, departing from long-standing custom to schedule a special teams period during the heart of almost every minicamp practice, rather than confining those segments to the pre-practice period and also requiring veterans, who normally are not involved, to take part.

Customarily low key in approach, the Packers' self-contained headmaster was somewhat less restrained than usual in essaying an overview, pronouncing himself "excited about our team because there is competition across the board.

"You know, for example, we have Cletidus Hunt outside at defensive end as a backup. We've moved him inside in our last minicamp—he played some 3-technique, and played it well.

"I think there's also competition at the tight end position (where first-round draft choice Bubba Franks and veteran Tyrone Davis are competing). Certainly in the safety position in the secondary there is (where Darren Sharper and LeRoy Butler are encountering the challenge of second-year pro Antuan Edwards)."

Also at center, Sherman acknowledged, where Mike Flanagan again is contending with veteran Frank Winters.

"If Flanagan is by far the best guy, then he'll end up playing," the head coach affirmed. "Frankie has a lot of experience at the position, which certainly gives us as coaches a certain amount of comfort. But Flanagan and Frankie will be competing, just like everybody else.

"So I will attest there is competition at a lot of positions. That excites me because competition elevates how you practice, which in my mind dictates how you play."

Beyond such matters, Sherman is aware his team has had to adapt—for the second year in a row—to a new head coach, a largely new coaching staff and a new defensive approach. And, on balance, he is patently comfortable with the response.

"Considering the turnover, I get a feeling everyone has adjusted fairly well," he said, appending a cautionary note, "That's me talking....You can ask them that question and possibly get a different answer, but I think that considering it's a new staff, it's a new defense, there's a new terminology on offense and we have new coaches at almost every position....I think they've done well. I told them right from the beginning they need to trust us....I believe they have. That's all I can ask for."

Like Holmgren before him, Sherman is intent upon making Lambeau Field a hostile environment for visiting teams, recalling that the Green and Gold forged a 25-game home winning streak over the 1995-98 seasons.

"There's no question, that when we do play in Lambeau, we have to take full advantage of the fact that we're here in front of the best fans in the NFL," he said. "We certainly don't want to disappoint them, so I think it's a tremendous edge and we have to take full advantage of playing at home... And hopefully we will."

Sherman is equally conscious of the Packers' rich tradition—including a league-record 12 NFL titles—and what a major motivational tool it can be.

"There's no question that what people have done here in the past—both players and coaches—is something special—something that you can definitely build on," he affirmed. "And I tell our players, 'Putting on the green and gold jersey of the Green Bay Packers is a lot different than with a lot of teams in this league.' It really is something special and they have to appreciate the responsibility that comes with wearing that jersey. You not only represent the present and future of the Green Bay Packers, but also a historic and tradition-rich past."

Sherman also is keenly aware that in specific terms, said "responsibility" revolves around the team's returning to the NFL playoffs.

"Our goal, first and foremost is to win the NFC Central Division," he asserted, "if you win your division, other goals become possible. I think when you have the certain key people that we have in place, I think we have a chance to do that. Obviously, playing in the NFC Central—one of the very toughest divisions in football—that challenge is enormous...but it's one we've had around here for a long time and that will not change."

One, however, that he is anxious to undertake.

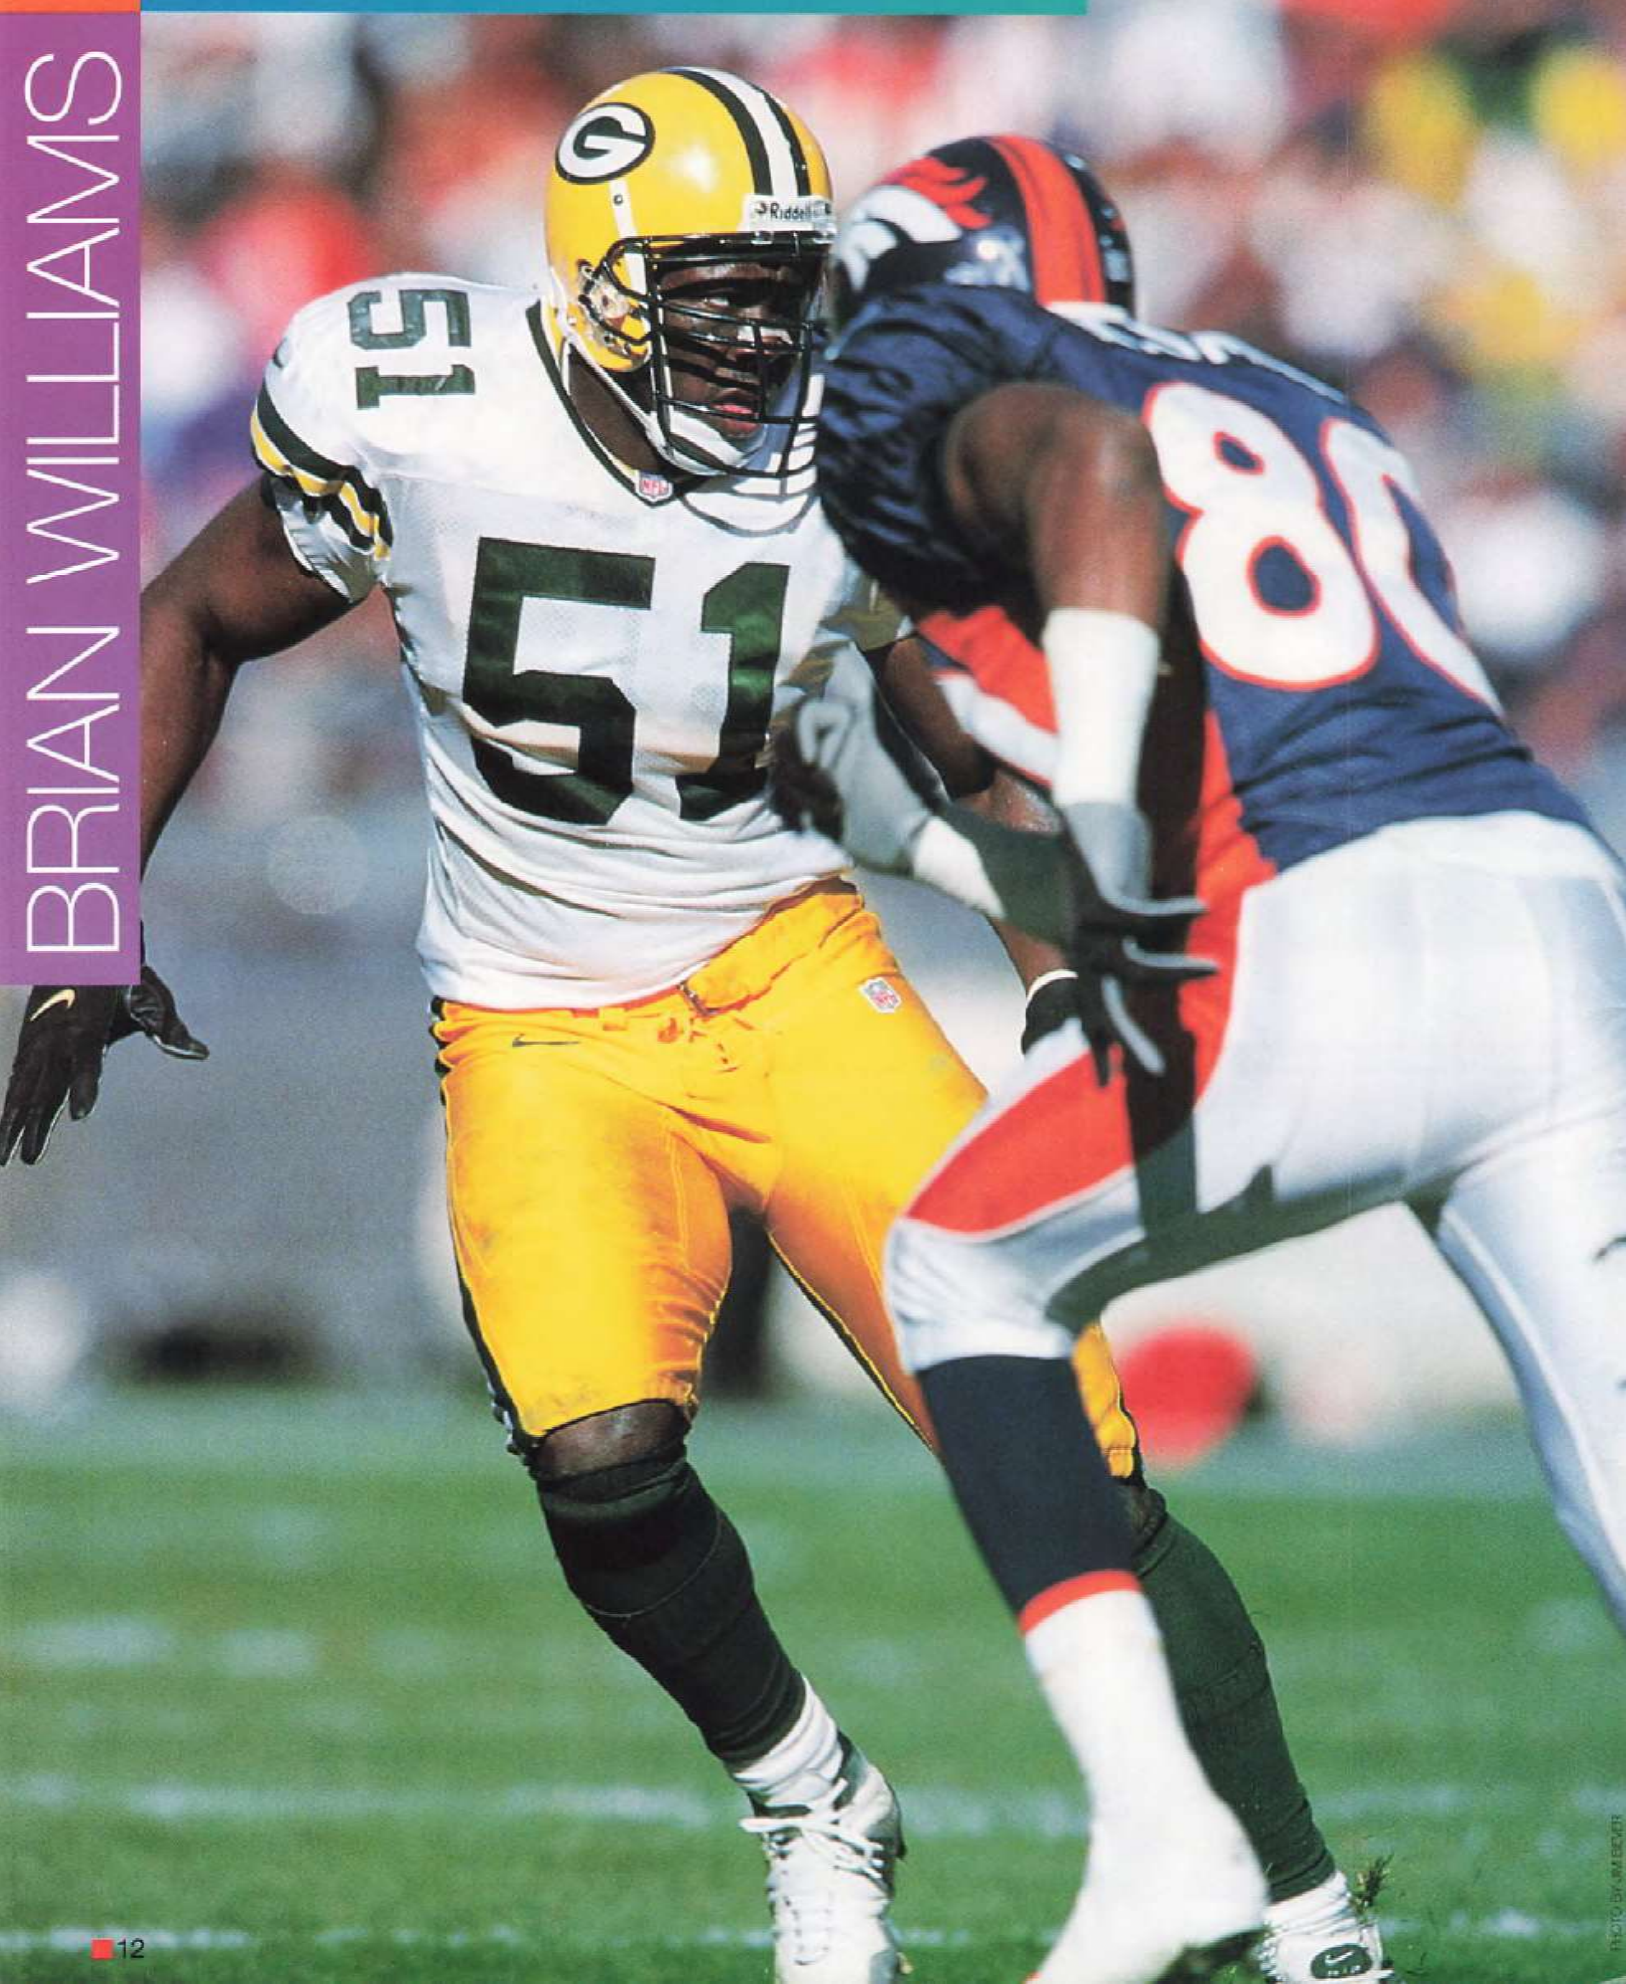

"I want to take full advantage of the preseason and the preseason games to get us ready. We have a lot of work to do if we are to meet our goals," Sherman assures, "but I'm very excited about the fact that we open the season, and end the season, in Lambeau Field."

"I'm pleased that the guys have done what we've asked them to do," Sherman enthused. "I have no complaints. They've met us more than half way."

"I feel like they trust us, and we trust them," he added, "and that is a major emphasis for me as we kick this thing off."

"So now it's up to us as coaches to make sure that we have good plans"...ever the key word in the Sherman lexicon..."and keep these guys going in the right direction. I'm confident good things will happen." ©

ROSSLEY'S CHALLENGE: TO RECREATE SOME OF OLD 'WEST COAST' MAGIC

THE OFFENSE

BY BILL WILLIAMSON

For those expecting wholesale changes under the Packers' new regime, they shouldn't look on the offensive side of the ball.

While the defense will have a faster, sleeker look in Green Bay, the offense essentially will remain the same unit it was when it was one of the most effective, powerful offenses of the 1990s.

The trick, however, will be finding the special spark enjoyed by Brett Favre, Dorsey Levens, Antonio Freeman and company, which, at times, disappeared last season.

Thus, the chief challenge for new offensive coordinator Tom Rossley is to help the talented Green Bay offense recreate some of its old magic. The method Rossley plans to use is simply a variation of the famed "West Coast" offense made famous in Green Bay under the guidance of offensive guru Mike Holmgren.

The offensive game plan, of course, will stay intact mainly because the team's new head coach, Mike Sherman, is well versed in both Holmgren's offense and the success it has had in Green Bay. Sherman—Holmgren's offensive coordinator in Seattle last season—was with the Packers in 1997 and '98 as tight ends coach and assistant offensive line coach. So, he knows first hand the type of talent he's inherited and the way it can perform under this system.

So, with a little tweaking and a little tuning, Rossley—who coached with Sherman in the mid 80s at Holy Cross—will keep the basic plan in place.

"We're not going to deviate too much," Rossley said. "We are going to put our own personalities in the offense, but this approach is proven here and the players are comfortable in it."

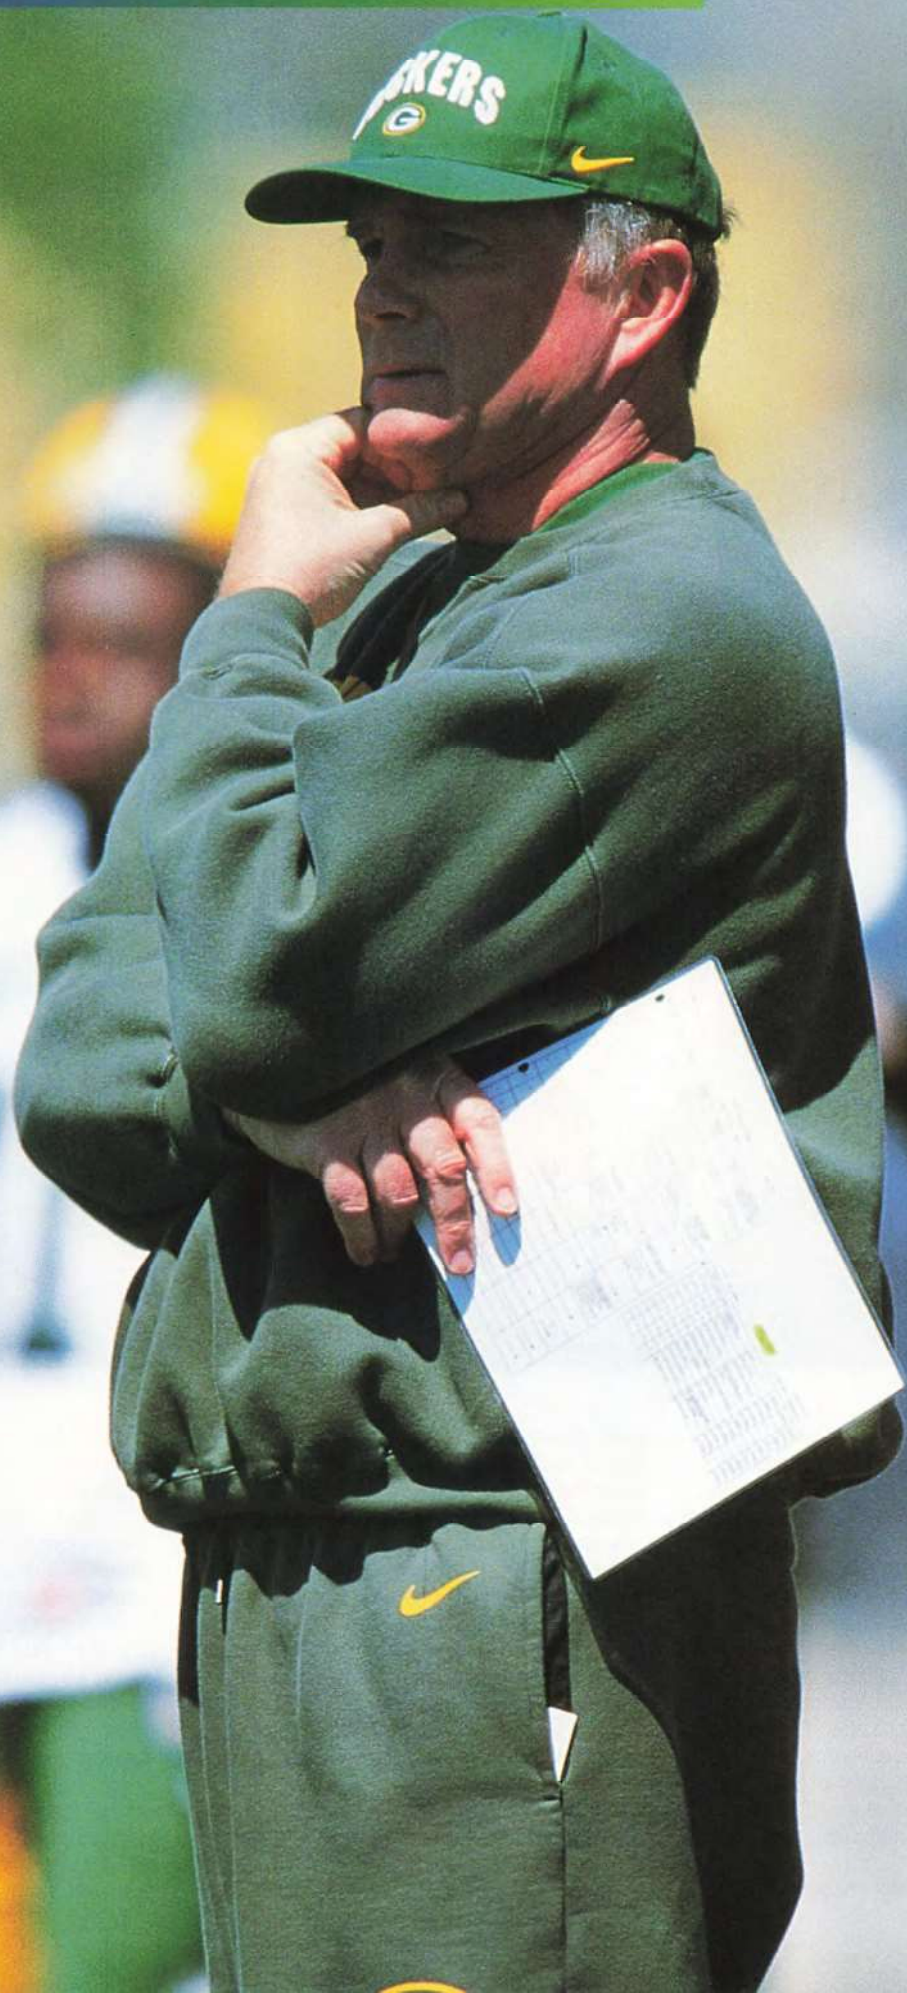

Added Sherman, who'll likely call most of the offensive plays: "We think we can freshen the plan up and initiate some things from watching film, but there will be no major changes."

Because the offensive system—which, in addition to Favre, Levens and Freeman, now features rookie tight end star Bubba Franks—will remain similar, the key components have had little trouble adjusting to the Sherman and Rossley way of offense. The changes are subtle.

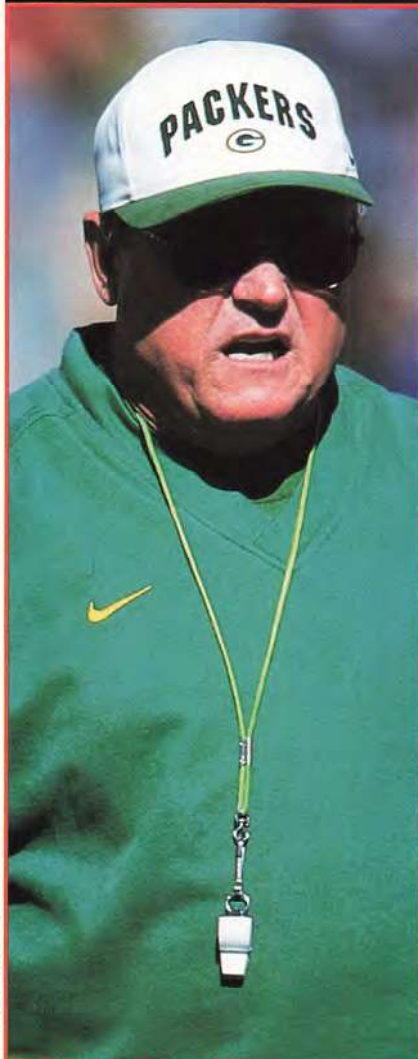

"It's not a lot different, but the things they ask you to do, the combination routes, are different," Freeman said. "Everything is a lot quicker now, with the timing and the techniques. It's not much different."

In fact, Freeman said minor changes could spice up the offense, which, at times, became stale last season in which the Packers fell to 8-8 and failed to qualify for the NFC playoffs for the first time in seven years in the one-season regime of Ray Rhodes.

Really, the changes needed, Freeman says, would be to draw more from the Holmgren era of simple, but effective pass plays.

"We have to get back to the slants. That's what we concentrated on in the minicamps, things that we were successful doing in the past," Freeman added. "Slants, where it gives us a chance to catch the ball five yards downfield and run for another 30 yards. That's how a lot of our receivers—the Sterling Sharpes, the (Robert) Brooks, and myself—we like to catch the ball short and get to survey the field and make plays that way."

The key to the Packers' chances of going back to the golden days—both in philosophy and in execution—of course, is quarterback Brett Favre. The three-time league MVP was masterful under Holmgren's controlled offense. So, the Packers have high hopes Favre, who struggled last season at times, will regain his trophy-winning form under the leadership of Sherman and Rossley.

Rossley has said he plans to keep a keen eye on Favre this season. Rossley and Sherman believe Favre can excel in the "smart aggressive" offensive scheme they plan to use. So they fully expect him to be less mistake prone than he was last season when he was hampered for the first three months of the season with a severely bruised thumb on his throwing hand. He threw 23 interceptions last season.

While Rossley knows and appreciates that Favre is the most creative player in the NFL, he also wants his quarterback to play within the system, because he feels the Green Bay offense can be among the most effective offenses in the league with a more controlled Favre at the helm.

"He's still going to make something out of nothing," said Rossley, who will also handle duties as quarterbacks coach. "But when he does that, we need to tell him, 'Well, that's great, but let's get back to what we're supposed to be doing.'"

So, while the changes will be difficult to detect, the objective in Green Bay is to get back to what the Packers are supposed to do—and that is winning games with a high-powered offensive game plan.

PACKERS INSTALL FAST-TRACK DEFENSE

THE DEFENSE

BY BILL WILLIAMSON

Who says the little guy has no place in the NFL?

In this post-millennium age of 350-pound defensive linemen, the Packers are going back to the golden age of the game. Indeed, the average-sized defensive player has a chance in the Packers' new defensive scheme where speed and agility rule over size and bulk.

The Packers' unique defensive approach is the brainchild of new defensive coordinator Ed Donatell. He derived the scheme from his days with the Denver Broncos. Donatell was the Broncos' secondary coach for the past five seasons. Of course, the small-ball look worked fine in the Mile High City as the Broncos utilized their fast-track defense to two straight Super Bowl championships.

The defense, known as a "one-gap defense" emphasizes the front seven (the defensive line and the linebackers) in one gap. Those seven players need to be able to run the field and make plays. The defense will have an aggressive approach, featuring line stunts and blitzes from the linebackers, safeties and cornerbacks, especially when corners are lined up against slot receivers.

It worked in Denver, now we'll see if it can work here.

"I'm excited about this new defense," said Packers defensive dean LeRoy Butler.

"Denver had some great defenses and we should be able to excel with it, too...It gives us a new spark."

The Packers' brass is confident the team can run their way back to Super Bowl form under Donatell's guidance.

"Speed is the key here," Packers general manager Ron Wolf said. "We want guys to run and make plays...We are very excited about this new system."

The approach is quite a departure from recent Green Bay defensive alignments.

The Packers, of course, had great success in the mid 1990s under the defensive direction of the late Fritz Shurmur. The Packers methodical, plodding but highly effective defense became the standard for quality defense in the league.

Then, last year, the Packers struggled to adjust to the attacking style of Emmitt Thomas, who guided the defense in the one-season reign of Ray Rhodes.

Now, it's a new system for the defense under first-year head coach Mike Sherman.

Of course, any scheme is useless unless the correct pieces are in place. So, after Donatell came aboard, the Packers' brass put together a plan to find the players best suited to execute the plan.

Now, after a busy offseason of searching for the perfect defender—fast, tough and able to make a tackle on the run—the Packers believe they are ready to step between the hash-marks at Lambeau Field with the type of players needed for battle.

"We feel very good about the type of guys we have," Donatell said. "We added key guys and the holdovers also fit in well."

The main additions and changes were made on the defensive line.

The Green Bay front four is no longer a hog heaven. It is now home to a sleeker, faster defender.

The key new additions on the line are venerable tackle Russell Maryland and ends John Thierry and David Bowens.

These players are not big for their positions. Maryland is just 300 pounds. Most men at his position play at 320-330 pounds. Thierry is just 265 and Bowens (who Donatell coached in Denver) weighs in at a scant 255. Not the prototype ends, for sure.

But what they lack in girth, these players make up with speed and the ability to get behind the line of scrimmage.

"We think we added guys on the line who fit what Ed wants to do perfectly," Sherman said. "They're playmakers and this defense is all about making plays."

There was little doubt Wolf had Donatell's scheme in mind when he prepared for the draft. They wanted speedy playmakers. From the look of the youngsters during the mini-camps season, it appears Donatell owes Wolf a thank you.

He got his type of players.

The Packers drafted tackle Steve Warren, end Kabeer Gbaja-Biamila, linebacker Na'il Diggs and safety Gary Berry and they all fit the mode of the new Green Bay defender.

"We're going to play more of a gap-control defense with more stunting, where guys are going to have to move around more than when (Shurmur) was here," Sherman said. "So we have to get fast guys...The players

we drafted are those types of players."

Added Donatell: "Every draft pick we have, we are going to look for speed and quickness. It's a big part of what we do."

Now that Donatell has his kind of players to execute his plan, he knows it's up to him to keep coming up with innovative, creative ways of ensuring his mighty-mite scheme works in the Dairyland, as it did in the Rocky Mountains.

"It'll be the same basic plan," he said. "We're not changing what we do each week; we just might do a little of this one week and a little less of that. It's a combination and it's what fits that week."

And it proves size doesn't matter in the NFL. ©

RON WOLF IS
'STARTING OVER'

Shortly after Mike Holmgren relocated to the Emerald City, Ron Wolf sat at a podium in a room packed with reporters and declared himself too old to start over.

The Green Bay Packers general manager said any head coach he hired to replace Holmgren would have to come equipped with previous head coaching experience. He would have to be someone who could keep the Packers' train rolling down the tracks because Wolf, who had just turned 60, didn't have time for a rebuilding job.

So he hired Ray Rhodes.

A year later, Wolf was back at that same podium, facing the same roomful of reporters. His message, however, was decidedly different. This time, he was starting over.

No, Wolf hadn't gotten any younger.

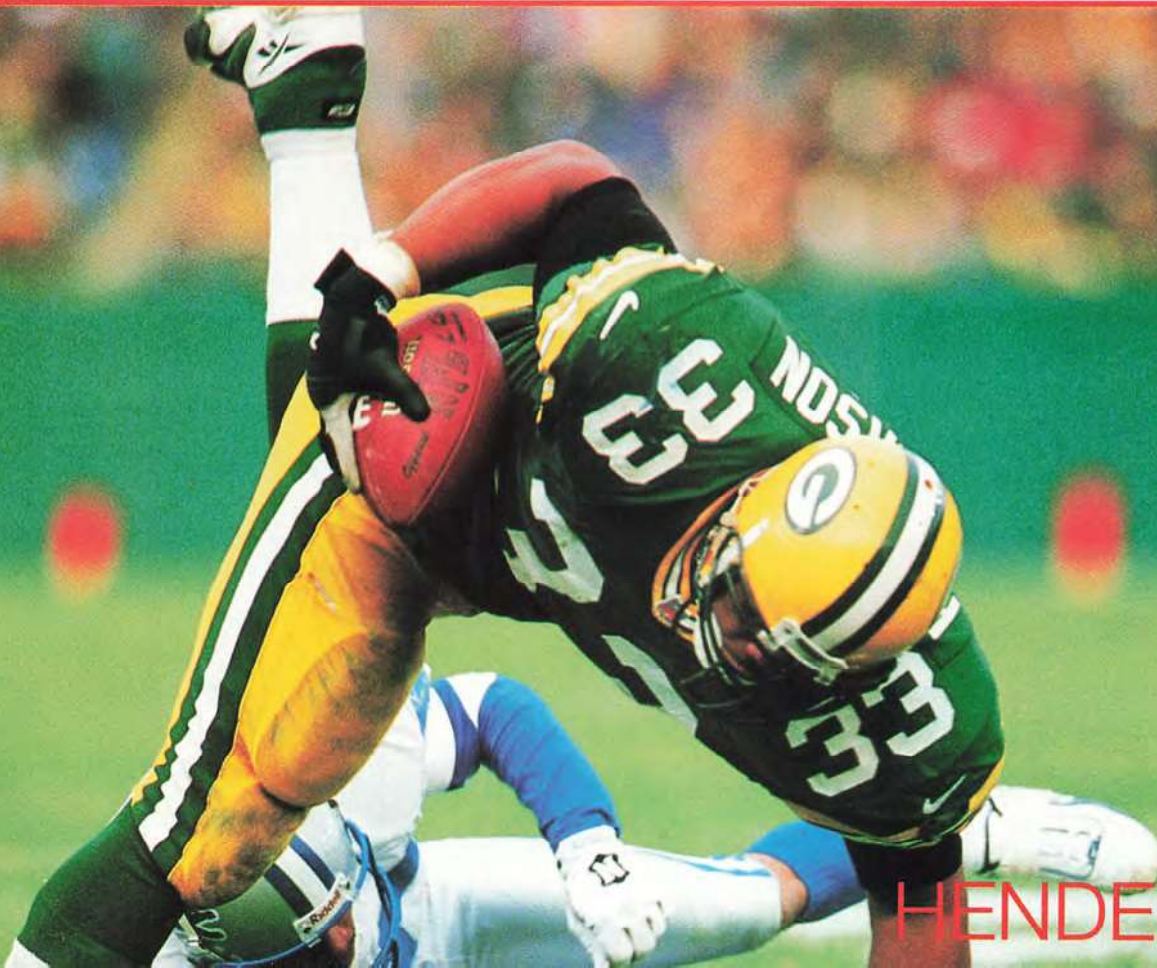

But when Rhodes was banished in January after one extremely disappointing 8-8 season, Wolf decided to go back to roots and select the coaching candidate he liked best, regardless of experience.

So he hired Mike Sherman.

In many ways, Wolf's third head coach in Green Bay is the anti-Rhodes. Sherman has no head coaching experience; in fact, he was only an offensive coordinator for one year. Unlike Rhodes, who talked a better game than he coached, Sherman is quiet, firm and detail-oriented.

Still, there is no getting around the fact that Wolf is literally starting over with a rookie head coach. Not that Wolf likes to think in those terms. He believes experience won't be an issue if Sherman re-instills focus and discipline in the team and leads the Packers back to the playoff

"I really don't think we're starting over," Wolf said. "We need to get the Packers back on the right track. Last year, for some reason that didn't happen. People were hired to do a specific job and you know when they're not doing it that you have to make a change. That occurred here, unfortunately.

"But we have to move forward. We have to go on and certainly with Mike Sherman I'm hoping that we made the right move at this point in time. All indications are we have."

It is Wolf's belief that Sherman, who prepped under Holmgren at Green Bay and Seattle after a long career in the college ranks, will restore the sense of purpose to a locker room that deteriorated in an alarmingly short period of time under Rhodes.

When Wolf hit the road scouting last fall, the Packers were 4-2 and coming off an excellent performance at San Diego. He thought all was well. He figured the train was still rolling down the tracks.

When Wolf returned six weeks later, however, he barely recognized the team he had so painstakingly put together. The train had jumped the tracks. He knew then a change had to be made.

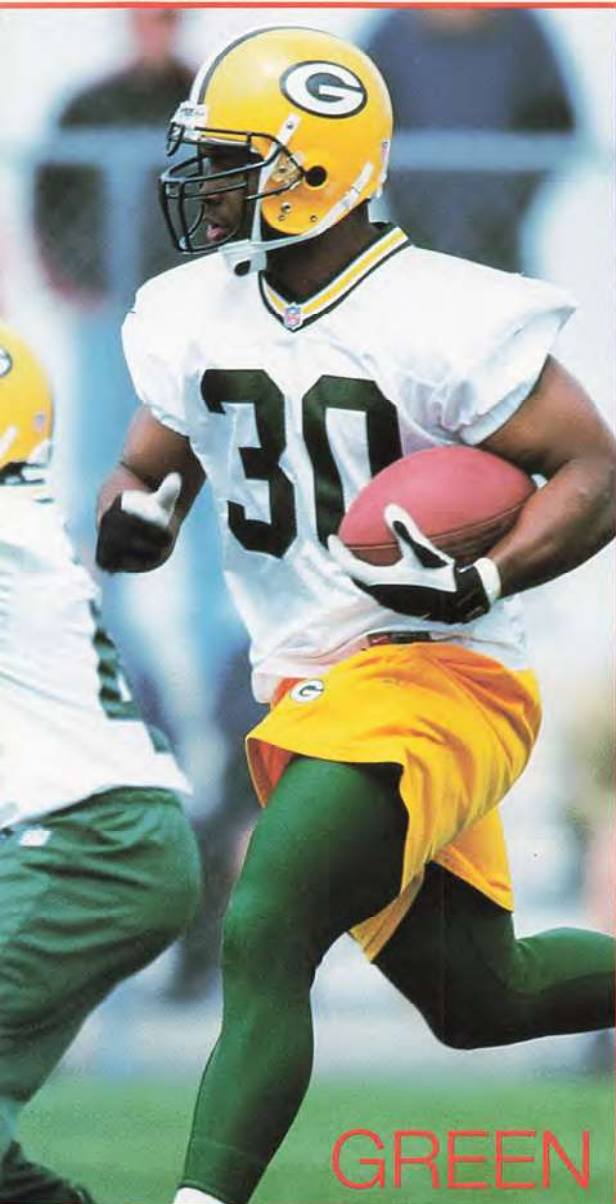

Wolf also learned from his experience with Rhodes that the essence of the coach counts more than the length of his resume. This time, he wasn't about to make the same mistake he had made when he hired Rhodes.

"I think I was too hard on myself; I put too many parameters on the job," Wolf said. "I wanted someone who had been a previous head coach and, more importantly, had been a previous head coach in the National Football League. Those guys are tough to find. I think I darn near parametered myself out. My choices were few and far between.

"Once I realized I had made that mistake, I changed my whole outlook and my whole process by talking to a lot of people. I talked to a lot of people who were successful coaches in football and eventually settled on Mike."

In his exhaustive process, Wolf employed the same criteria he used when he hired Holmgren in 1992. He waited until he found someone who literally blew him away. When Sherman and Wolf sat down to talk, Wolf knew his search was over.

Because Sherman had coached tight ends for the Packers in 1997 and '98, he arrived with a working knowledge of the organization. To Wolf, that familiarity makes it seem at times like Sherman isn't really a rookie head coach.

"But the fact remains he is and we'll have to see how that works," Wolf said. "I think he's one of these people for whom the groundwork has been laid. He's had considerable experience at all levels in the game of football and I think the road ahead of him is going to be very, very good."

In Sherman's first six months on the job, Wolf watched him direct four minicamps and adroitly handle some difficult off-the-field situations. However, Wolf knows the true test of Sherman's abilities won't come until the regular season begins in September. That's when everyone will find out whether Wolf made the correct choice this time.

"I think it's a little bit too early to tell," he said. "But we're a little bit better organized. I think we're going to be better disciplined. I think he has the players' attention, which I'm not sure Ray had last year."

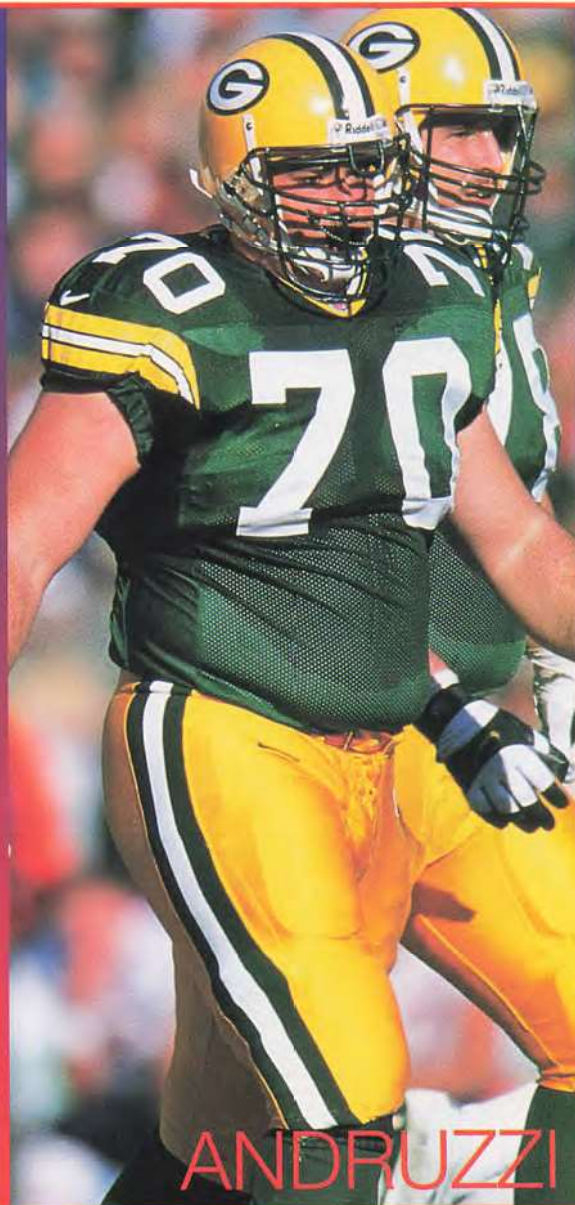

Some have referred to Sherman as Mike Holmgren Lite. Given Holmgren's success in his seven years with the Packers, that's not a bad thing. Wolf doesn't reject the comparison out of hand, but he didn't go out looking for a Holmgren clone, either. That, too, would have placed too many parameters on him.

However, Wolf doesn't deny that he wants Sherman to re-establish the teaching atmosphere and attention to detail that existed when Holmgren was coach.

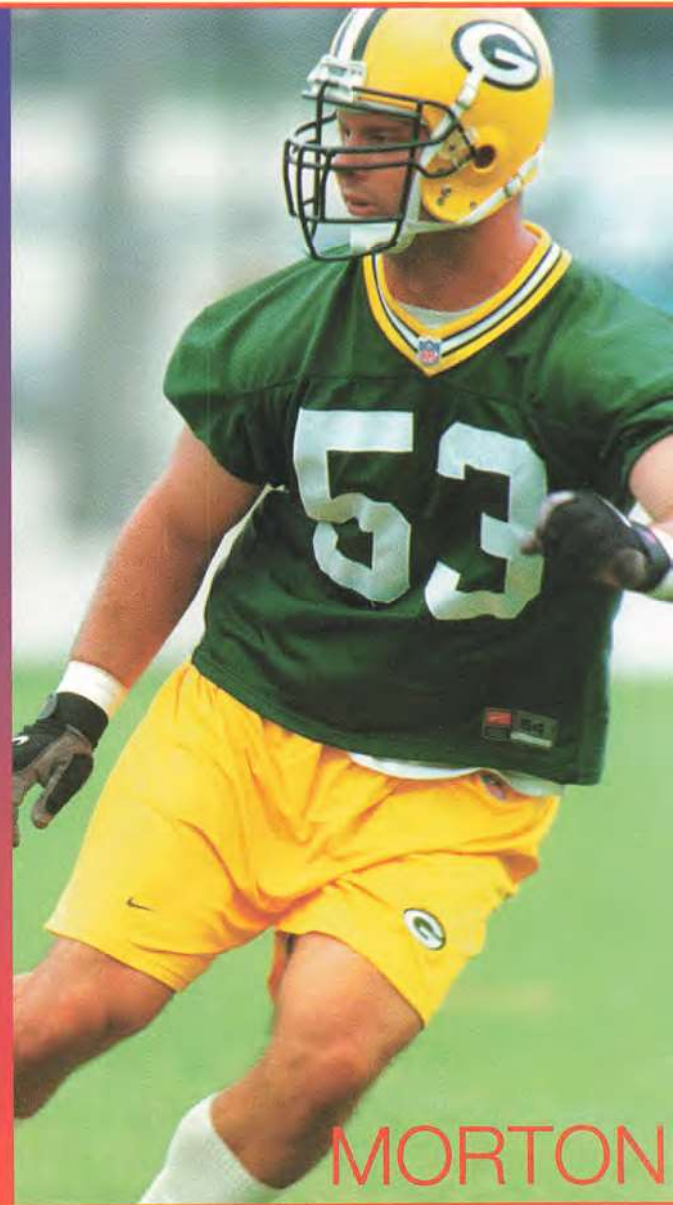

"I think we needed structure and discipline last year," Wolf said. "I think people thrive on that, for whatever reason. At the tail end of last year, we did not have that."

Rhodes and Sherman not only arrived with different resumes, they came with different agendas. Rhodes slipped in quietly, trying to fit in with a successful, veteran team rather than exert his will over it. Wolf expects Sherman to shake things up a little bit, to put his imprint on a team that was stung by what transpired in 1999.

"I just wanted to get someone in here that could run the operation the way it needed to be run," Wolf said. "I think you can consider discipline a part of that. Let's face it, we had some games that we could have won and not all of that was the coach's fault. For whatever reason, things here last year didn't work out and I did not want to go through that again."

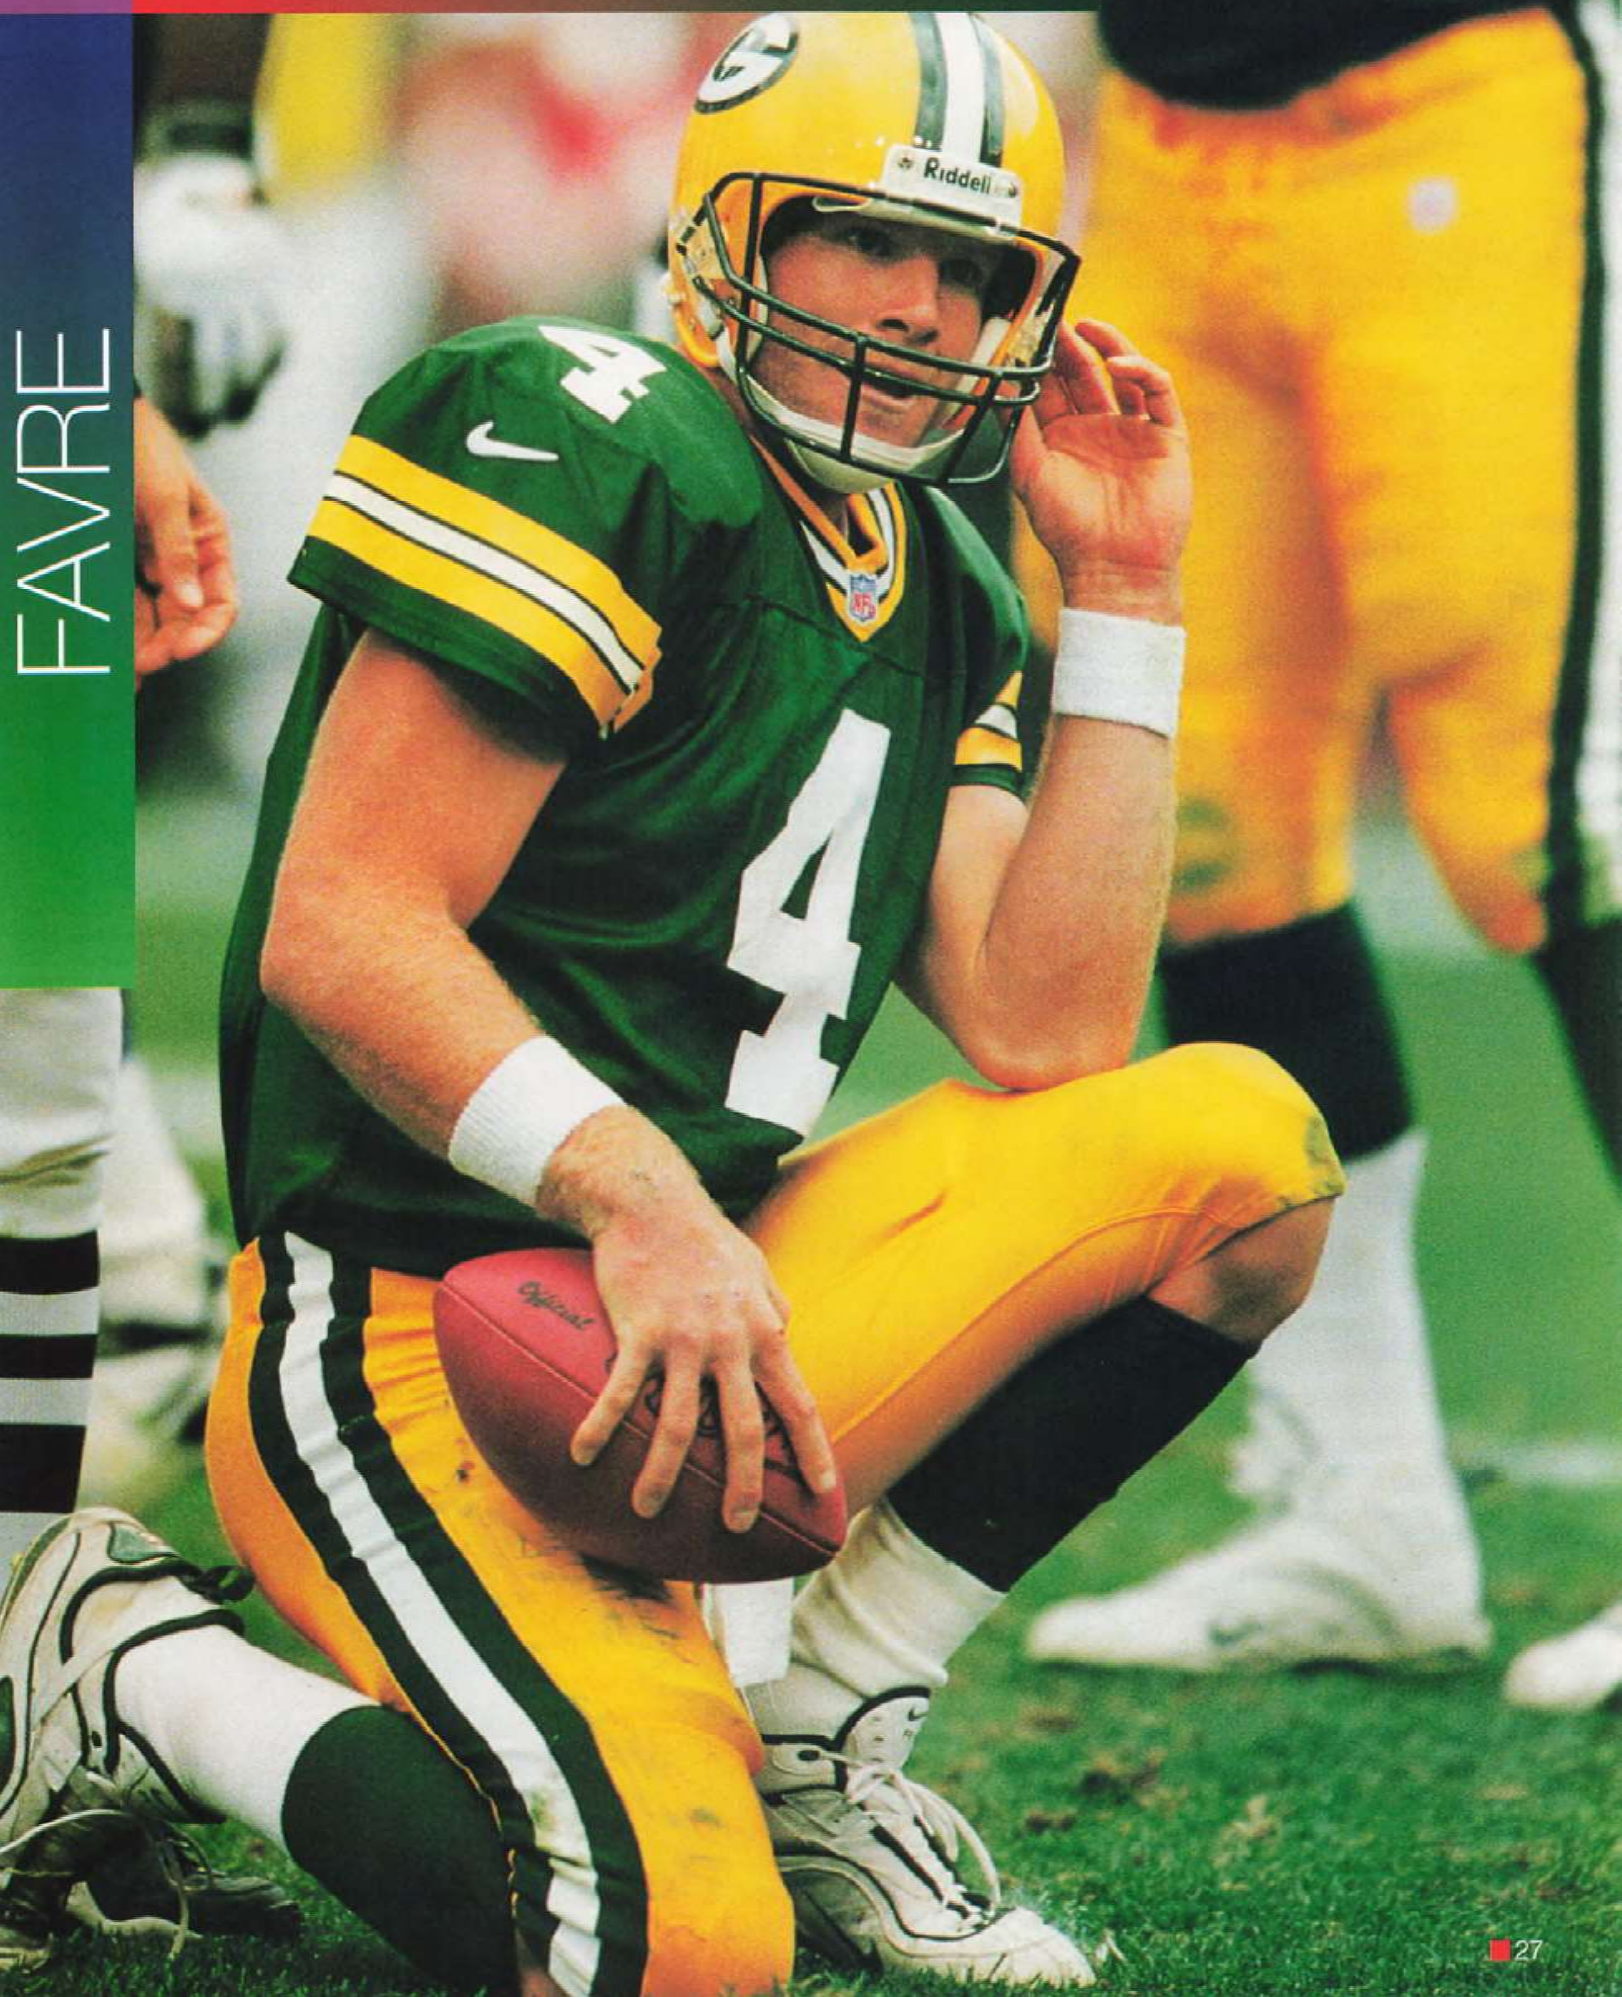

He may be too old to go through it again. Not that he's worried about that. After thoroughly checking out the available candidates, he emerged with an abiding faith in Sherman, rookie or no rookie.

"I don't think it's a big gamble at all," Wolf said. "The reason I say that is because of all the people I talked to through the interview process. As you talk to people, you find somebody who's focused, somebody who really has a genuine love and interest for the game and somebody who can command the type of respect that's needed today. And I think Mike Sherman fits all of those categories."

That's why Ron Wolf, at age 61, doesn't mind starting over.

BY CHRIS HAVEL
Green Bay Press Gazette

Brett Favre wrinkles his nose at the notion he could some day eclipse the numerous all-time NFL passing records set by Dan Marino, the prolific Miami Dolphins quarterback who retired this year.

First, he believes Marino's records, especially his 420 touchdown passes and 61,364 yards, are as unapproachable as Joe DiMaggio's 56-game hitting streak and Wilt Chamberlain's 100-point game.

Second, he has no intention of hanging around long after his skills diminish merely to chase a legend.

"I don't think Marino or (John) Elway would've played as long had they won a Super Bowl," he said. "I was fortunate to win one early in my career. I don't want to be 38, 40 years old and struggling just to get up out of bed. Every guy who's ever played football can say it takes a toll and they'd be right. I've started 130, 140 games including the postseason, and that stuff starts to add up.

"I enjoy life too much to walk with a cane." Favre turns 31 on Oct. 10.

He has started 132 straight regular season games, the fourth-longest active streak in the league. He has started 146 games including the playoffs. Both are records at his position.

His durability has enabled him to pile up impressive numbers as he enters his 10th NFL season. He has 235 touchdown passes and 30,467 yards. If he plays nine more seasons, or the same amount (17) that Marino was a starter, he would have to average 3,385 yards and 20.5 touchdowns to match Marino's marks.

Favre believes it's a tall order. Not impossible, but certainly a long way off.

Packers general manager Ron Wolf would agree.

"I think it's doable," Wolf said. "With Brett Favre it certainly is. But those are staggering numbers. It's a testament to how tremendous that guy (Marino) was."

Even Favre's own family members are skeptical.

"I've never thought there wasn't anything Brett couldn't do on a football field," said Irvin Favre, his father and high school coach. "But breaking Marino's records seems like a longshot. The numbers he piled up are amazing, and to be honest, I'd be surprised if Brett could break them. I'm not saying he couldn't do it. I'd never say that about Brett. But whew! That's a lot of touchdowns."

Typically, Favre is infinitely more concerned with the present than the future.

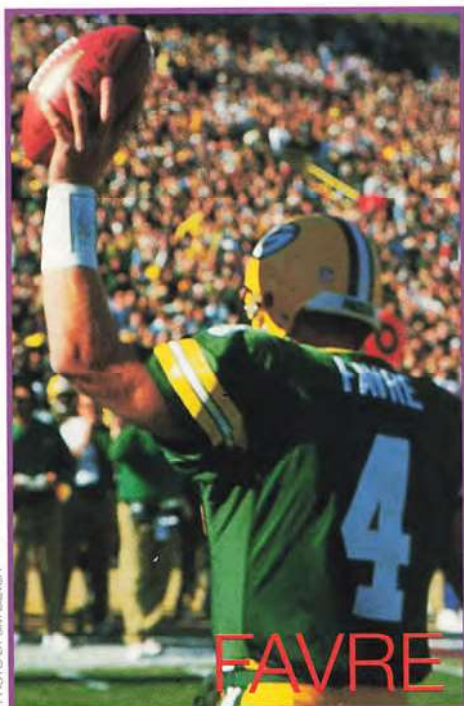

He would like to add to his three Most Valuable Player awards, mostly because he knows it would mean the Packers have had a successful season. He is focused on trying to win a Super Bowl, rather than chasing Marino's records.

"I'm healthy and I'm ready to go," he said of the upcoming 2000 season.

Favre described his 10th offseason as his most enjoyable.

DAN MAY BE CATCH-ABLE, BUT

FAVRE'S NOT CHASING

He continued to work out, but not at the maddening pace of a year ago. He weighs 226 pounds—up from 214 pounds in 1999—and he looks considerable more healthy.

"I was burned out by the second game last year," he admitted. "I worked out too much in the offseason and it took its toll. I had no energy."

This year, Favre looks primed for the season, and that includes his right thumb. The bumps and bruises and sprains it endured last season were well-documented, and Favre is weary of talking about it. He understands the media and fan interest — "it's impossible to throw without a thumb," he said—but in the same breath he adds, "There's really nothing to talk about. The thumb is OK as long as I don't get it hit. I don't think it's any more susceptible now than it ever was. It's just that people are talking about it."

Favre is anxious to get the 2000 season underway, but he admits he is going to miss his friend and tight end, Mark Chmura, who was released during the offseason amid sexual assault charges and the team's desire to create room under the salary cap.

Chmura was perhaps Favre's most reliable target during the past decade.

"Until I actually get to training camp it won't hit me that he's not there," Favre said. "Training camp was when we spent the most time together. Once the season starts, everyone is on their merry way. I don't even know where most of the guys live, but I knew where their room was in the dormitory."

"I love (Chmura) like a brother," he added. "But life goes on. If he was playing and I wasn't here anymore, or Frankie (Winters) was gone, he'd keep playing and catching passes from somebody else. It's the nature of the job. Now, if he needs me, he knows I'm always there for him. But now I have to turn my attention to throwing to someone else. But believe me, I'll miss me and Frank going to his dorm room and giving him a hard time about whatever. That's not easy to replace."

Favre is eager to get to work under new head coach Mike Sherman and his staff. He intends to challenge himself to stay mentally sharp, even though he knows the playbook better than the layout at the Hattiesburg Country Club.

"Sometimes you have to sit through those meetings and grin and bear it," he said.

Former Packers coach Mike Holmgren, now the coach and GM in Seattle, constantly reminded Favre to try to find something new in each play. Favre would be skeptical, thinking, "Find something new? There's only two receivers going here, the running back going there...."

"Now, it makes sense. What he meant was that I should challenge myself to consider every possibility with each play, and if that happens, it'll keep me from being surprised during a game or worse, dozing off and missing an open player in the third quarter that might've been the difference in the game."

The priority, he said, is winning. Let the records fall where they may.

"I don't want to go out on a sour note," he said. "I want to be at a high level when I leave. I don't want someone to say, 'Brett, we love you, but we've got to let you go.' The Packers and their fans have been so good to me, I want to be that good back to them." ©

FRANKS

BY JASON WILDE
Wisconsin State Journal

Bubba Franks knows all about the situation he is getting himself into. He knows why he is here, who he is replacing and why he's replacing him. He knows why his character will be as important as his pass-catching and why he needs to be a solid citizen, as well as a solid tight end.

But Franks isn't going to mind his P's and Q's just because he's almost assuredly going to be the Green Bay Packers' new starting tight end, or because of what the guy who had the job before him, Mark Chmura, allegedly did.

No, Franks has to stay on the straight and narrow because his mom expects him to.

"He's got to watch his manners everywhere he goes," Janice Banks said of her son. "No choice about it."

BUBBA: No. 1's A SOLID TIGHT END

"She stressed at an early age that you weren't going to get anywhere in life being a troublemaker," Franks said. "So that's something I took pride in, and I've kind of held that as a responsibility to her, as well as to myself, to stay out of trouble."

With Chmura's career finished in Green Bay—he was waived by the team in June and will go on trial likely in December on third-degree felony sexual assault charges and child enticement charges stemming from an April 9 incident at a post-prom party in Hartland, WI—Franks, the Packers' first-round pick (14th overall) in the NFL draft in April, is expected to fill the void.

Last season, with Chmura missing all but two games with a neck injury, the Packers' offense stagnated without a viable tight end. Franks worked hard during his first three minicamps, but has a long, long way to go before he's ready for the season to start.

"I think it's way too early to evaluate anybody, in particular the rookies at this stage, but I thought he did some good things," head coach Mike Sherman said. "He still has to improve his route-running and he's a long ways from there."

"But he does make some catches that are not easy catches, and it's hard to teach that. I think we can teach him to run better routes. I don't think we can teach him to run and pluck the ball out of the air the way he does. I think he'll be fine."

When Sherman says Franks will be fine, he's referring to on-the-field. But he might as well have been talking about off-the-field, as well. The first-year coach has been preaching since his arrival what a well-disciplined team he wants to put on the field, and Franks sure seems like a good starting point.

"We tried to pay particular attention to (character), because there's a uniqueness to come here and play for this team," Packers general manager Ron Wolf said after the draft. "I was sitting upstairs and talking to (Bubba) about what it means to be a Green Bay Packer and what it means to come here and play. His views of that are interesting."

Those views on life were shaped mainly by his mother. The middle child of Janice's five kids, Franks' father left when he was 3 years old.

"It was hard. It was hard being mother and father," Janice said. "We did without a lot, but what we had, we shared."

When Franks decided to declare himself eligible for the draft after his junior season at the University of Miami, Janice made him promise that he'd finish his degree. Right now, he says he's about 24 credits short.

"That's something I've got to follow through with," Franks said.

He also plans on following through with another promise he made to Janice—to take care of her now that he can afford to. Once Franks does sign his first professional contract, he has promised his mother a new car and a new house in Midland, Texas, not too far from his hometown of Big Spring. Bubba says it's the least he can do for the woman who made him the person he is today.

"How much do I owe my mom? I owe my mom the world, and then some," Franks said. "She was a single parent, she raised me, she was like my mother and my father. So I would give my mom anything right now, she can have everything. I told her before I even go buy me a sandwich or a Coke, she's going to be taken care of. She should enjoy this a little more than I should."

Funny, his mom thinks just the opposite. "I take a little bit of credit for how he turned out, but I give most of it to him," Janice said. "He's the one who worked long and hard to get to where he is. All I did was push the education and staying out of trouble."

It seems to have worked out just fine. Franks promises that the money and fame of being an NFL player won't change him, and knowing the way his mom raised him, it's hard not to believe him.

"That's something I've never worried about," Franks said. "I've never been rich, so I don't know what it feels like. But I'll probably just be the same person I am now. I don't see myself changing. ☺"

CONTRIBUTION'

THE 2000 DRAFT

BY DOUG RITCHAY
The News-Chronicle

With free agency the way it is in the NFL, the draft has become more and more important for teams.

It is difficult in today's NFL to keep all the young impact players on your roster because of the almighty dollar. Knowing that, the impact rookies can make for a team can go a long way in determining success.

After the draft was completed this April, Packers general manager Ron Wolf was optimistic five draft picks would be able to help this season as the Packers try to erase last year's 8-8 record.

"They should be able to," Wolf said. "I say that for two reasons. Number one, they have to because of the system we're under. More importantly, a lot of guys have displayed the ability to be able to make the transformation from the collegiate field...it's hard as you can imagine without pads on, but these guys were drafted watching them play games, not watching them run around in shorts. If they can maintain that same level, we should have guys that can make a significant contribution to our team this year."

First-round draft pick, tight end Bubba Franks, is expected to be one of the five contributing rookies. For the Packers' sake, he has to be as he is replacing Mark Chmura who was waived this spring because of salary-cap concerns.

Unnecessary pressure for a 22-year-old? "I don't think so," Wolf said. "He's a first-round draft choice; the 14th player picked. He wasn't picked to sit on the bench, he was picked to play. I don't think there's any undue pressure on him. That goes with being selected number one."

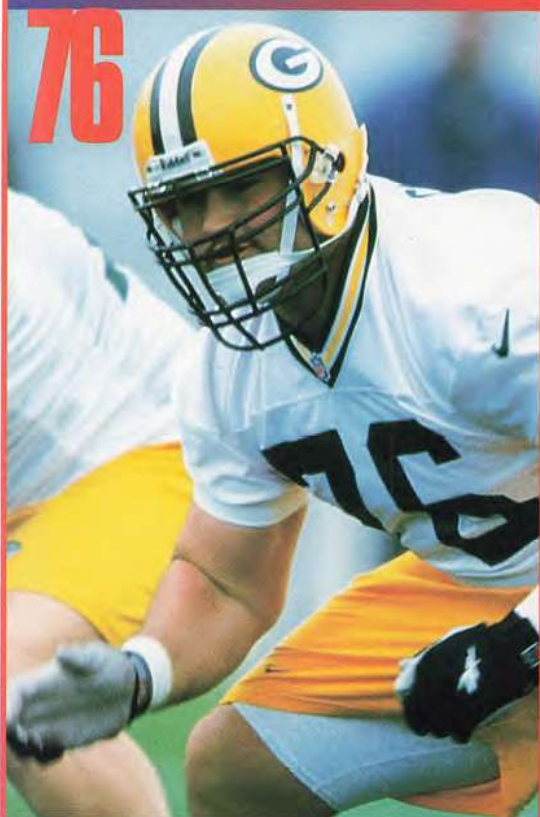

Wolf has been impressed with Franks, and not just with his athletic ability.

"He's knowledgeable, he's a hard worker, he can catch the football," Wolf said. "He needs to work on his blocking, but I think that'll come. I think he's going to be a good player."

Beyond Franks, just where the Packers will get contributions from is anybody's guess. Wolf, though, isn't looking for five starters, he is looking for players who can help in any area, including special teams.

THE 2000

Veteran safety LeRoy Butler liked what he saw from the draft picks in the off-season minicamps.

"They're coming in and wanting to learn," Butler said. "They're not coming in with their college experience, thinking they know everything. Whenever you can have guys who want to learn and absorb what the veterans tell you to do and the coaches tell you to do, it's more synchronized."

A few lower-drafted players who were impressive during the off-season minicamps, according to Wolf, were safety Gary Berry (fifth round), tackle Mark Tauscher (seventh round) and linebacker Eugene McCaslin (seventh round).

Berry, from Ohio State, has 4.5 speed, which is more like a cornerback's speed. Tauscher, from Rose Bowl champion Wisconsin, could establish himself as a likely backup to the always-steady Earl Dotson at right tackle. McCaslin, from Florida, was a running back first in college, but his athleticism has allowed him to make the transition his senior year for the Gators.

Berry and McCaslin define what the Packers were looking for defensively in the draft. Speed kills in defensive coordinator Ed Donatell's system and Green Bay went for speed with other defensive picks.

Ohio State linebacker Na'il Diggs, a fourth-round pick, will challenge for the strongside linebacker starting spot, and he does have the ability to get upfield as proved by his 15 tackles for loss and six sacks for the Buckeyes in 1999.

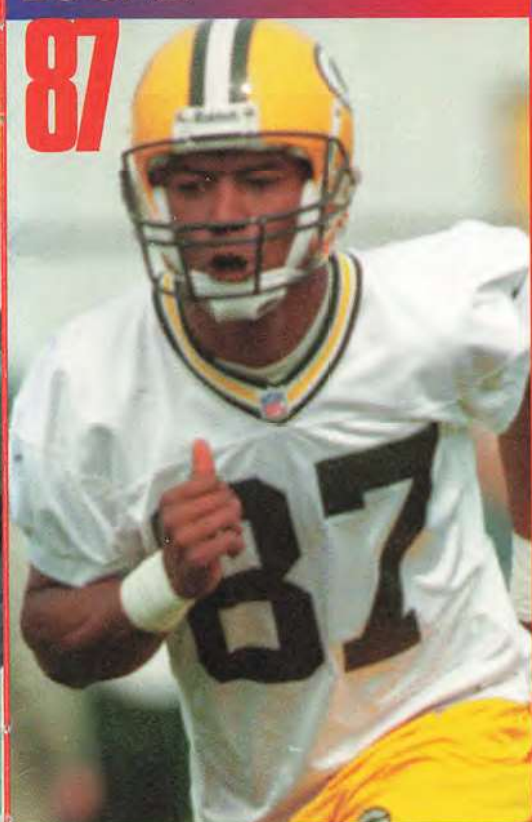

Then, the Packers really went small when they selected 244-pound defensive end Kabeer Gbaja-Biamila in the fifth round from San Diego State. Gbaja-Biamila is smaller than some linebackers, but his numbers don't lie. In his last three seasons, Gbaja-Biamila had 33 sacks and 42 tackles for loss, including 21 last season.

"They're also big guys; they're going to play anyway," Wolf said when asked about drafting speed. "Speed always plays an important part. I don't think it had to do so much with the staff. By the same token, it doesn't make any sense to draft a guy who can't play in your system. Speed's a criteria, so we have to address that."

Speed on offense was addressed by picking wide receivers Anthony Lucas from Arkansas, Charles Lee from Central Florida and Joey Jamison from Texas Southern, who is more of a return specialist. Lucas battled a knee injury in the off-season, but showed promise. Lee showed good hands and Jamison's time will come, returning punts in the preseason.

LUCAS

Green Bay also picked LSU running back Rondell Mealey in the seventh round. Mealey received plenty of experience in the off-season camps as Dorsey Levens, De'Mond Parker and Basil Mitchell missed a lot of time because of injuries.

Also, second-round pick Chad Clifton, a tackle from Tennessee, impressed coaches with his play in minicamps and should be a backup to Mike Wahle at left tackle.

The Packers also addressed a needed position in defensive tackle, selecting Nebraska's Steve Warren in the third round and Ron Moore from Northwestern Oklahoma State in the seventh round. Warren is expected to play as a backup.

It appears Wolf has pieced together a solid draft, but it's still hard to predict how many starters could come from this group.

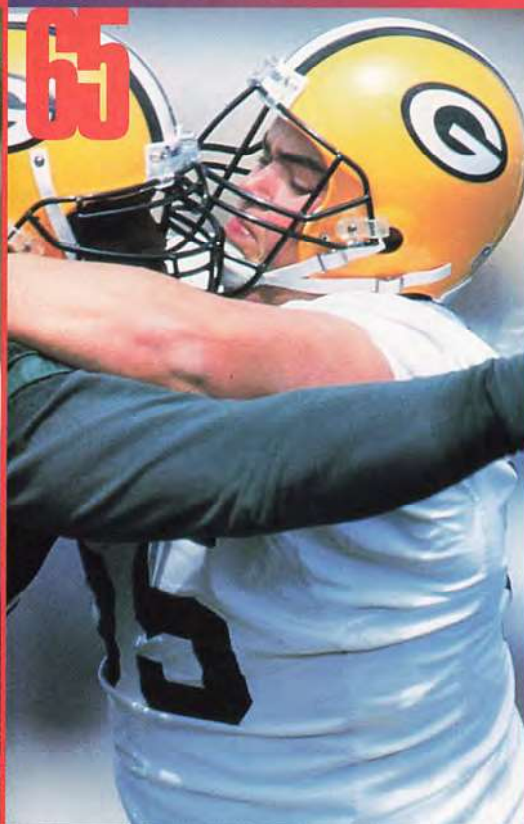

"I don't have any idea," Wolf said. "I put five out there, I would hope we could get five." ☺

AT THE NOSE: MARYLAND'S A GOOD FIT

BY BUD LEA
Milwaukee Sentinel
sports columnist emeritus

The big man was happy to be at a place he was wanted. But on the night before his first meeting with his new team, he didn't sleep well and he couldn't stop his mind from racing.

It was heading toward dawn, a night in late April. And there he was, wide awake in a Green Bay hotel near the Don Hutson Center. He was nervous. He was contemplating his unique place with the Green Bay Packers, of all teams, feeling restless clear through to his heart.

One question he kept asking himself was this: "How do I fit in with the Packers?"

He tried to square with himself, to come clean with the truth. He wasn't the same player he was in 1991 when he was with the Dallas Cowboys. He was 31 years old, and the Packers were expecting a lot of him. He was fully prepared to deal with reality. But the answer he kept hearing was, "you're smarter at this game. With experience comes wisdom, and, if anything, you can bring that to the table."

There is plenty of evidence to suggest Russell Maryland is right for the Packers. A 10-year veteran, he played the past four seasons with the Oakland Raiders before being waived March 31 for salary cap reasons.

Maryland was the first player selected in the 1991 draft. He earned three Super Bowl rings with the Cowboys. He was elected to the Pro Bowl in 1993. He was a two-time All-American and Outland Trophy winner at the University of Miami. He graduated with a degree in psychology.

But the Packers weren't studying Maryland's past achievements and degree when they signed him to a three-year, $8.3 million contract, including a $1.65 million signing bonus. They are at a point where they need one guy at the position of nose tackle to take it over and help turn around a defense that slipped badly last year.

The Packers sorely missed Reggie White's presence on and off the field in 1999. Big Gilbert Brown all but ate himself out of a job, and their front four didn't work as hard as they used to work when Reggie was involved.

It didn't take the Packers much time to figure out Maryland was a player they wanted. According to the scientists of this game, he is a professional athlete with tremendous integrity and work ethic. He will be a leader.

The Packers recruited Maryland hard when he became available. Coach Mike Sherman flew to Oakland to meet with Maryland and his wife, Rosa. Sherman already knew that Maryland had been a solid NFL player for nine seasons, so football wasn't the main topic of conversation. The coach wanted to make sure the good things he heard about Maryland's intangibles were true.

Was he really a high character guy?

Would he be a good influence on a team that would be loaded with young players?

"I heard tremendous things about him as a player for what he has done, but also that he had great character, was a great person who understands how to play the game," Sherman said. "After visiting with him and his wife, I became very impressed with both of them. They are a tremendous couple, quality people, and I am excited to have both of them on my team."

Maryland was just as impressed with Sherman.

"He came up to my house knowing that I couldn't go anywhere because I had a baby due in a couple of days," Maryland said. "He came out and we had a nice little talk. It wasn't really all that long and we really didn't talk a bunch about football and about schemes. We just talked about life and things in general. That really impressed me and it really made me respect him."

Maryland loved playing for the Raiders. The Raiders loved him, all right. They loved him so much they cut him, saying they couldn't afford him any longer because of salary cap restrictions.

Basically, it comes down to almost starting over for Maryland, who had been a starter in the NFL for nine seasons—five with the Cowboys and the last four with the Raiders. He will be dealing with new teammates, new coaches, a new system, new city, new friends and new faces.

Despite the many changes, Maryland should add stability and depth to a shaky defensive line. The Packers were unable to address the defensive line position fully in the draft, adding only Nebraska defensive tackle Steve Warren in the first four rounds.

"What he is, is our starting nose man," general manager Ron Wolf said of Maryland. "I think he's got enough left in his tank to help us. He's a quality individual."

When Maryland was with Dallas, he played both over the center as the nose tackle and over the guard. But he was willing to accept moving to nose tackle full time with Oakland and handle more dirty work.

When asked how many snaps, per game, he can play at a high level, Maryland smiled and said, "As many snaps as I'm out there. I always play at a high level. I give 100%. That's what I've always been known to do and taught to do."

The Packers' Mike Wahle backed up Maryland's claim.

"He's relentless," Wahle said. Wahle made his first NFL start in the 1999 opener against the Raiders and got a healthy dose of Maryland.

"He never stopped playing," Wahle added. "It was like, 'My god, he came hard. He never stopped until the whistle.'"

If Maryland can still bring it like Wahle swears he can, not only tackle Santana Dotson but also middle linebacker Bernardo Harris should benefit. Dotson should have more sacks (he had 2 1/2 in 1999) and Harris more tackles in the offensive backfield.

Maryland's presence in the locker room and his work ethic may end up being the Packers' greatest asset.

"I kind of compare myself to the average person who might be out in the steel mill," he said. "I grew up in Chicago and my father had a great work ethic; he worked for Chrysler for like 28 years. My mom worked for the Chicago police department as an accountant for like 20 something years.

"I try to pattern myself after them, and work ethic means everything to me. If that is being a great locker room guy, then so be it. That's just me."

It isn't easy being a nose tackle in the NFL. You play head-up on the center. You need a high pain threshold, toughness, quick feet and great strength. You can't just take a defensive end and put him at nose tackle. You need more of a rough, tough guy.

Maryland packs 300 pounds on a 6-foot-1 frame. He has a 20-inch neck with biceps to match.

Playing nose tackle is almost like you're lining up and trying to see how many people can hit you. The more people that hit you, the more successful you are. Basically, nose tackles are there to be used and abused.

Maryland sometimes feels misunderstood. He plays rough, and he's the guy who slammed into Brett Favre's injured thumb when the Raiders came to Lambeau Field last September.

As a Raider, he didn't care who liked him in Green Bay, Seattle or New York, as long as people who followed the Raiders liked him. He's really a nice guy. His wife loves him. His mother loves him. His young daughters love him. He's a good husband, a good father, a good son, they say. What else can you ask?

So here he is, 2,000 miles from Oakland. Driving into town from the airport, he read a population sign: Green Bay 97,000.

"Man, I thought there was a lot more up here," he said. "It definitely felt like a lot more when we came up and played in Lambeau Field."

He is aware of the expectations the Packers have of him. "Of course it is a lot of pressure," he said. "Everyone is counting on me. You know, that will be on a lot of people's minds: What can Russell do for the Green Bay Packers? I told Mike Sherman, I have to be honest with myself. I'm not the same Russell Maryland I was in 1991. But...I'm a lot smarter at this game. With that age comes wisdom.

"It's good to have that kind of pressure on yourself. You're still a little bit nervous."

Maryland refuses to dwell on what might have been had he stayed with the Raiders. He figures the more flexible he and his family are to moving on, the better off he will be. Being able to change is a key in life itself.

He said the Packers' approach to defense was similar to the Cowboys, with the emphasis on hustling, and a sense of urgency. All of us remember the years Maryland plugged the middle of the Cowboys' dominating defense. The Packers never could run against it.

The Packers need all the best hands on deck for the 2000 season. They will need a nose tackle. Quite obviously they need Maryland at his physical, intense best.

He also is preparing mentally to find comfort in Green Bay. A degree in psychology can't hurt.

VERBA

'INCREDIBLE' VERBA COMES FULL CIRCLE AT LEFT GUARD

78

BY LARRY McCARREN
WFRV-TV

As a 6th, 7th, and 8th grader growing up in Des Moines, Iowa, Ross Verba played left guard for the Southside Packers.

Whether you call it coming full circle, history repeating itself, or plain old fashioned fate, Ross Verba is once again playing left guard for a team called the Packers, only this time it's for "THE" Packers.

He was switched from left tackle this past off season and early returns aren't just favorable, they're incredible. "I'm shocked. I didn't know how he'd adjust, but it's just like water off a duck's back for this guy.

He looks like a natural to me. I'm ecstatic about it so far. I think he can be a real big timer for us," says offensive line coach Larry Beightol.

Verba's also very pleased four mini-camps into the move, but he wasn't always so wild about the concept of changing positions. The subject was broached last fall and his reaction was instantly negative. Verba recalls, "I had a lot of pride in what I did last year as a left tackle. When they said, what do you think about going to left guard, I don't think the timing was right. I got defensive and my pride stepped in."

Pride in playing left tackle is understandable. It's more or less regarded as the "skilled" position in the offensive line due to its importance in pass protection. Its importance is also underscored on the bottom line. Left tackles are generally the highest paid of the guys up front.

Consequently, the move was stuck in neutral and then Verba injured a knee against the Lions late in November. For all practical purposes, he was out for the rest of the season, but the injury might have been a blessing in disguise. "I had a lot of time to think," he says.

Verba thought about his career and his faith and came up with the conclusion that playing guard might not be such a bad idea after all. He says, "God said I'm going to give you the desires of your heart son, but you're going to have to do what I want you to do."

Apparently the good Lord, Mike Sherman and coach Beightol were all on the same page.

In Verba, the Packer offensive coach saw someone "Who wants to be a very aggressive guy and would be a better player in a shorter area than if we're always putting him out there on the island. I could see this guy becoming a real good football player inside."

Coach Sherman had the bigger picture in mind when promoting the switch. According to Beightol, the Packers' head coach told Verba that, "It isn't always just about the money, sometimes it's about being a good team guy. I think what he (Mike Sherman) had in mind was if we can get one player to make a little bit of a sacrifice for the team, it would really show up well and show up big."

Obviously, the good Lord also came up with a pretty good sales pitch because "presto-chango" Verba is suddenly thinking, "For me to be the pro bowler I think I can be immediately, I should be playing left guard."

Verba's pride may have gotten in the way of the move at one point but, it too, did a 180 and played a major factor in his not only accepting, but embracing the change.

Left tackles may be the offensive line's glamour boys league-wide, but in the rough and tumble world of the NFC Central, that's not necessarily the case.

Warren Sapp of the Buccaneers, the Vikings' John Randle, and the Lions' Luther Ellis are some of the NFL's most dangerous pass rushers and they all play inside.

Coaches Sherman and Beightol emphasized to Verba, "What this is going to allow us to do, with all the great defensive tackles we have in this division, is give us a chance to really match up with a real top notch guy."

Verba may be playing a different position, but he'll still feel the same pride in knowing he's blocking the best the opposition has to offer game in and game out.

Add it all together and Verba's gone from rejecting to considering to loving his new home. He's playing left guard like he was born there. "When I went there at my first mini-camp, it was just so natural, I just don't have bad practices and I'm going to refuse to have bad practices. I'm always physical and sometimes at tackle that would cost you, whereas at guard, if you're physical every play, you're going to the Pro Bowl," said Verba.

If his season is as good as his start at left guard, and if the Packers enjoy team success, Verba could very well end up there.

The best way to describe him is a technique-orientated brawler. Ross would disagree. He says it's the other way around, that he's a brawler with technique. Regardless, he's a player who likes to mix it up, but doesn't lose track of where he's supposed to be and how he's supposed to get there in the process. And that's fairly rare.

Ross will also be more athletic than a lot of guards because superior athleticism is one of the reasons he was playing left tackle in the first place. He had the quickness, foot movement, and balance that was necessary to play in that space. Like Coach Beightol says, "He has all the tools that it takes for him to be a big timer in there. I mean a dominating player and that's what I'm excited about and that's what I'm looking forward to seeing."

The Packers "O" line coach is also excited about the prospects for his group as a whole and Verba's move to left guard has a lot to do with that optimism.

It's allowed young, but very talented Mike Wahle to take over at left tackle and that allows the Packers to enter the '00 season with an extremely formidable offensive front. Beightol exclaims proudly, "It makes us a bona fide physical group. right across the board. We're going to be over 300 pounds, quick, athletic, can move their feet, can come off the football and get after people. I'm so excited I can hardly stand it right now." ©

A HOT CORNER

BY PETE DOUGHERTY
Green Bay Press Gazette

When the Green Bay Packers selected cornerbacks with each of their first three draft picks in 1999, Mike McKenzie on the surface looked like the least likely to end up as their starter.

But considering that first-round pick Antuan Edwards had a toe injury that required surgery after the draft, and second-rounder Fred Vinson had surgery just after the college season to put a pin in a broken bone in his foot, McKenzie in fact had an opening.

Through the offseason minicamps and much of training camp, Edwards and Vinson either couldn't practice or were limited to one workout a day, whereas McKenzie was at full speed the entire time. That extra work plus impressive playmaking won him the starting job at left cornerback when the regular season started, and once he got his hands on it, he never let go.

"It's very difficult (to start at cornerback as a rookie)," said Tyrone Williams, the Packers' starting right cornerback. "Coming from college, there's totally different receivers and totally different quarterbacks. To come in and play the way he did, it shows what kind of player he is."

When he joined the Packers, McKenzie was aware of the other two rookies' injuries, but he didn't realize those ailments would limit their practice time. And he also knew they had a returning starter in Craig Newsome, while he was unaware that the Packers were looking to replace him.

So becoming a starter as a rookie really wasn't on his mind.

"I pretty much was coming in just trying to make the team," McKenzie said. "I was thinking more along the lines of learning what everything was about and trying to get a feel for the tempo of the game."

McKenzie ended up having an excellent rookie season and actually was one of the Packers' better defensive backs most of the time. He finished the year as the team leader in interceptions with six and in passes defended with 18. Among other things, that's evidence that other teams were testing him often, but it also suggests he was up to the test much of the time.

"Being a rookie, I knew I was going to get plenty of action," he said. "I went out and played the position as if they were going to be throwing my way every play. I figured, when they throw it, great, and when they don't, that's great too."

One of the hardest adjustments rookie starters have to make is the NFL's 16-game schedule, as compared to the 11 or 12 games that teams play in college. While

McKenzie said he did hit a little lull late in the year, he rebounded by knocking down seven passes in the final three games and getting two interceptions in the season finale against Arizona, when the Packers were still mathematically in the playoff race.

"It's a very exciting spot," McKenzie said of his position. "At corner there's no week off, there's no players off, there's no downs off. Most receivers in this league are pretty good, and if they catch you loafing or down in your play it could very well be a touchdown. So I really came into it focusing on a play at a time."

McKenzie was a little bit of a surprise entry into the draft when he decided to forego his final year of eligibility at Memphis State to play in the NFL. While he was all-Conference USA his sophomore and junior years, he wasn't regarded as one of those outstanding underclassmen who would be a high draft pick. Among other things, there was some question whether he'd be a cornerback or safety in the NFL, because he played two games at safety for Memphis in his junior season, which made some scouts think that Memphis had questions about which was his best position.

Most teams hadn't scouted him closely during the season because they didn't think he'd enter the draft early, so that left them with catch-up work in the spring to evaluate him as a pro prospect. McKenzie, in fact, went into the draft even though he had no assurance he'd be selected in the first four rounds. Though he and his agents consulted many sources, he really didn't have much of an idea when he'd get taken.

But he was tired of playing for a losing team, and after making all-conference as both a sophomore and junior, he didn't see much reason for sticking around the college game.

"We weren't winning anyhow," he said. "It was a situation where school was going to be there, so I decided I might as well (turn pro). I was receiving individual accolades, but there were no team (accolades) and I'm team-oriented. Going into last year, we didn't have too much to look forward to as a team."

McKenzie knew he would get drafted, but that was about it.

"The people who saw me liked me a lot, and the people that didn't see me, a lot of them didn't even have me on their draft board," he said. "I figured I'd get drafted, but I wasn't counting on any round, one through seven. When I went in the third round to the Packers, it was great."

McKenzie is only about 15 credits, or a full-time semester, away from his degree in business management, and he plans to finish that work over the next couple of offseasons. He even missed the first day of one of the Packers' post-draft minicamps this year because he had to take a final exam for a class he attended this spring.

"I pretty much live day to day, tomorrow's not guaranteed," he said. "I've been in school all my life, so there's no sense in stopping now. And I'm finding out this league is big business, so a lot of things I've been learning (in school) coincide."

McKenzie now is returning for his second season as starter, and he's established himself well enough that the Packers moved the burgeoning Edwards from cornerback to safety this offseason. Edwards is fully recovered from the toe surgery that slowed him all last season, and the Packers think he's ready to be a significant player and perhaps even a starter this year. But unless McKenzie has an unexpected letdown, Edwards' best shot of breaking into the starting lineup is at his new position, safety.

McKenzie, meanwhile, appears to have an equally bright future. But he wouldn't say what that future holds, at least for his own play.

"It's hard to say," he said. "I sure see a Super Bowl coming, I can definitely tell you that one. Outside of that, I'm going to just continue to work hard and let the chips fall where they may."

BRADFORD

BY PETER JACKEL
Racine Journal Times

Don't let Corey Bradford's illuminating "I'm-so-happy-to-be-here" smile fool you.

The affable, polite and easy-going wide receiver for the Packers will smile when he talks to you. Bradford admits that he smiles when he lines up against cornerbacks the caliber of Deion Sanders, Aeneas Williams and Charles Woodson during the most intense moments of autumn Sunday afternoons.

"They're like, 'Man, he's killing us and he's smiling!'" Bradford said.

guy gets down the field and makes the plays he makes, then that's a plus."

Bradford hasn't been able to help but smile since that April day in 1998 when this former standout sprinter became gainfully employed at the professional level. It was bounds at the Packers' 8-yard-line.

The fact that the Lions went on to score a few plays later is almost irrelevant. It was during that one moment when Bradford's awesome athletic ability, not to mention his desire, went on display for all to see.

"That was one of the most amazing things I've ever seen," Packers reserve quarterback Matt Hasselbeck said.

Ask Bradford about that play, though, and he'll carry on as if it really wasn't that big of a deal.

COREY "KILLS" WITH A SMILE

Heck, you can even imagine Bradford with one of his innocent, disarming grins as he's getting chewed out by a coach, reminiscent of the dopey smile Gomer Pyle used to wear during those tirades from Sergeant Carter on that 1960s comedy series.

Just always be assured that when Brett Favre fades back to pass, Bradford is going to be driven to chew up a defensive back and spit him out. Oh, he'll be smiling all along, but his burning eyes and raging inner competitive drive will belie that pleasant personality.

"I'm gonna tell you, he's like a quiet assassin," said Ray Sherman, the Packers' new wide receivers coach. "He's a guy who's going to smile, but when it comes time for competition, he plays with an energy and a toughness that you like. I mean, when you looked at last year, even on special teams, the guy made plays. He was one of the top special-teams players on this team."

"So he can smile all he wants. When a during the fifth round of the NFL draft that year when Packers general manager Ron Wolf gambled that a raw talent who had played just one season at Jackson State could be an impact player in the NFL.

"I feel so blessed to be in the NFL and whatever they call on me to do, I'm just like, 'Man!'" said Bradford, breaking out in his customary smile. "Other guys who are not even playing would love to be in my position just to run down the field on a kickoff or a punt."

That explains why Bradford, who started to flash potential last season by averaging a James Lofton-like 17.2 yards on 37 receptions, still recklessly throws his body around on special teams. That explains why Bradford made that spectacular pursuit of the Detroit Lions' Terry Fair during his 91-yard kickoff return last season, miraculously making up some big-time real estate in the Pontiac Silverdome during what seemed like a hopeless situation to push Fair out of

"When I went down on the kickoff, I thought, 'OK, he's gone,'" he said. "And then I thought, 'OK, Corey, even though he's going to score, I'd like to see some effort.' When I kept running and running, I was seeing that I was getting closer and closer to him and I was like, 'Man!'"

"I wasn't even thinking. I was just running."

And this might be just the start for Bradford, who also flashed his big-play potential last season with plays that included a 74-yard touchdown reception on a slant pass against the Seattle Seahawks and a spectacular one-handed, over-the-shoulder catch in the rematch against the Lions at Green Bay.

"That still amazes me," Bradford said. "It's like, 'Man, how did I do that?'"

While he remains second on the depth chart behind Bill Schroeder at wide receiver opposite of Antonio Freeman, it's going to be difficult to keep Bradford out of the lineup for long. Having mastered a playbook that he likened to "a college chemistry textbook" when he first arrived in Green Bay two years ago, Bradford is now far more instinctive on the field.

Ray Sherman, who knows something about exceptional receivers having worked with Randy Moss, Cris Carter and Jake Reed as the Minnesota Vikings' offensive coordinator last season, could see that development from the opposite sideline.

"I remember last year when we played them I could see he was a guy who could run," Sherman said. "With young receivers, you watch for certain things and you can see there are going to be some things he's going to be able to develop with experience. And you can see that he was hungry and that he had a good attitude because of the way he played."

Bradford, who has spent much of the offseason addressing his penchant for dropping balls (he led the Packers with 10 drops last season) insists his smile will remain even if Bill Schroeder again opens the season as the starting wide receiver opposite Antonio Freeman.

"I just look at it as both of us are going to go out there and work hard and we're going to leave it up to the coaches to decide who's going to start or whatever," Bradford said. "But it really doesn't matter because if he plays this series and I come in and play the next series, we'll be on the sidelines cheering each other on." ©

To appreciate Frank Novak's zeal for life, you need only listen to how fondly he remembers his first football coaching job 35 years ago as a varsity assistant in Iron Mountain, Mich., teaching 9th and 10th grade English and making $6,000 a year.

"I didn't think it got any better than that," Novak said. "Coaching the Mountaineers, we had a good quarterback, we won some games. I had a couple bucks at the end of the week to go get a beer. How could you possibly have a better job than that?"

Novak has found plenty, making his way as an assistant coach through six different colleges (including his alma mater, Northern Michigan), the USFL, and now his fourth NFL city, Green Bay. He's taken his exuberance with him every step of the way, mixing in his loves of fishing and racquetball whenever he can. His energy and enthusiasm have helped him find his professional niche, as an NFL special teams coach.

Energy—or as Novak calls it, emergency—is what special teams is all about. With field position constantly shifting throughout a game, and a score or change of possession possible at any time, Novak's return and coverage teams have to be ready at a moment's notice. It keeps Novak on his toes from the minute he wakes up on game day, and he wouldn't have it any other way.

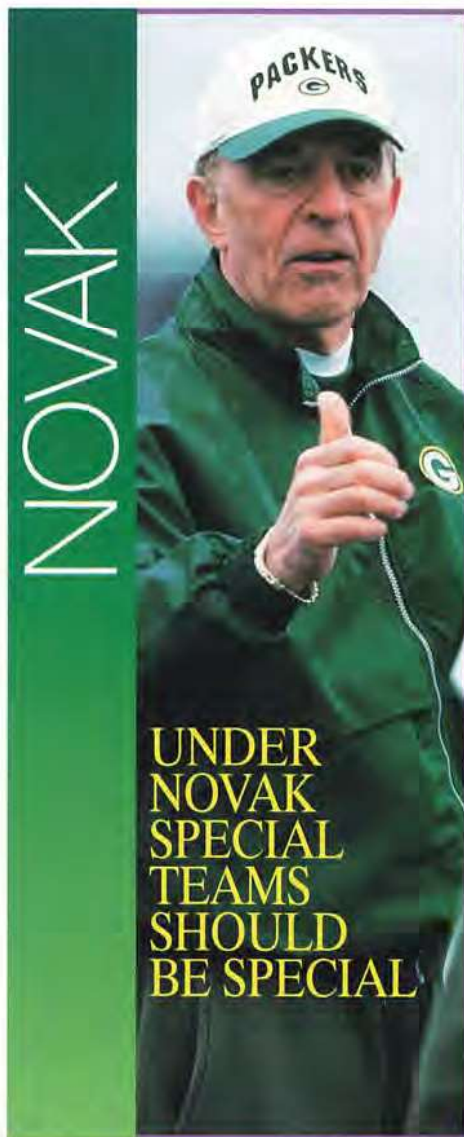

"When you coach offense or defense, you get to take breaks, go get a drink of water," he says in his animated, fast-paced voice. "It's not like that with special teams. There are fourth downs coming up all the time. If you have an injured player, you need a backup to fill in for him. Just getting 11 guys on the field is an arduous task at times."

Novak's leadership brings instant credibility to the Packers special teams units, which struggled through the 1999 season. Field position was hurt by a poor return game and by erratic coverage squads. Three field goals were blocked, one that cost Green Bay a victory over rival Chicago.

His peers consider him a successful motivator who relates well to his players, and his track record suggests they're right. In 1994 under Novak, the Houston Oilers kickoff coverage unit ranked No. 1 in the league. In 1997, his San Diego Chargers scored five special teams touchdowns, the most by an NFL team in a single season.

"If I know one thing, you'd better buckle your chinstrap when you come to play against a Frank Novak team," said Tampa Bay Buccaneers special teams coach Joe Marciano. "His teams are not going to try to trick you. They line up and say, here we are, here we come, and if you're better than us, fine, but if not, we're going to put a whuppin' on you."

BY MIKE SPOTFORD
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Novak is confident he can get the Packers special teams back on track, maybe even back to their prominence of 1996, when the return game in particular was an integral part of Green Bay's run to the Super Bowl XXXI championship.

To Novak, the best special teams players aren't necessarily the most talented, but the guys to whom special teams matters. He believes the Packers have that in Corey Bradford, Jim Nelson and Scott McGarrahan, among others, as well as a top-notch long snapper in Rob Davis and a reliable kicker in Ryan Longwell.

He's also excited about the addition of Ahman Green, picked up in an offseason trade with Seattle. Speedy but very strong, Green is expected to return kickoffs and play a key role on coverage teams.

Heading into training camp, questions still remain at punt returner and punter, where second-year pro Josh Bidwell is trying to return from testicular cancer. But in the four offseason minicamps, Novak has seen new head coach Mike Sherman's commitment to special teams, and that has meant as much as anything.

"He has given me the time on the field and time in my meeting rooms, and that's all I can ask for," Novak said. "We have the backing of the coaching staff, good people, and I feel good about the situation."

"I'm approaching this season with as much enthusiasm as I've approached any season."

For a guy like Novak, that's saying a lot.

He has worked under coaches and coaching styles at opposite ends of the spectrum, from the humorous antics of Jerry Glanville in Houston to the structure and discipline of Mike Sherman in Green Bay.

But his style always has its place. He appeals to the players' pride, and that comes in part from defending his own pride when necessary. Back in 1998, unannounced to Novak, the Chargers brought in a special teams consultant they expected him to use in drills and meetings.

Novak was so insulted and angered he resigned after Week 1.

"I'm not a young guy who just fell off the turnip truck," he said. "I know how to line them up. I know how to motivate my people, and I wasn't going to be the fall guy because other segments of the team weren't looking good at that point."

"I didn't care about my contract, I didn't care about anything. I'm a low-maintenance guy. I have a fish pole, a place to go play racquetball, I can get by."

Less than two years later he received job offers from the Raiders, Packers and Saints within a span of five days, and in some ways moving to Green Bay has allowed his coaching career to come full circle. While an assistant at Northern Michigan, Novak's head coach was Rollie Dotsch, who eventually became the Packers offensive line coach under Dan Devine.

Plus he's only 100 miles from Iron Mountain, though Novak has never really been far away at all.

"I'm in a love affair with life, my job, my friends," he said. "I'm healthy, I've got a couple of bucks in my pocket. I coach at a good place. It doesn't get any better than this." ©

JUST DUE: RON WOLF ENTERS PACKER HALL OF FAME

BY BUD LEA
Milwaukee Sentinel
sports columnist emeritus

Most pro football teams, when the program starts to slip and the defeats pile up, look around the country for the biggest, meanest, fastest players they can find, guys who won All-American honors, Lombardi blocking awards, Heismans, national championships.

Not the Green Bay Packers. You would have thought the Packers needed a lot of guys like that after the 1991 season in which the team played 16 games and won four of them, and fans started grumbling that big changes again were needed.

Instead, the Packers picked up a guy who wasn't No. 1 on any draft list. They picked a guy who had never played a down of big-time football, never won a trophy or made the cover of Sports Illustrated. A guy who played a little bit in high school and in the service as a receiver. A guy, who by his own admission, was "not very good." A guy who became fascinated with pro football as a youngster because his father took him to Baltimore Colts games.

And on top of that he was 53 years old and getting to the point where he could tell when it was going to rain by his knees.

You would have thought the Packers had plenty of old, slow guys. I mean this was a franchise not even Sterling Sharpe could help.

But, when the Packers signed Ron Wolf on Nov. 27, 1991, the Packers got more than a seek and destroy linebacker or a rampaging runner or a fleet wide receiver. They got to do more than complain about decades of mediocrity since the Glory Days.

They got instant credibility in the league and a chance to shout, "We're going to the Super Bowl?"

Don't think that hasn't made an impression on management. "The two most important people in this franchise in the last 50 years are Vince Lombardi and Ron Wolf," team president Bob Harlan said.

"He got Brett Favre, Mike Holmgren, Reggie White. Everyone thought once free agency got here the Packers would be the first team to get in trouble. But he went after the best of the free agents, built a championship team, and went to two Super Bowls. I can never thank Ron Wolf enough."

Wolf was enshrined in the Packers' Hall of Fame July 28. He was the lone inductee to be honored, bringing to 124 the number of players, coaches and contributors enshrined since the first class was inducted in the fall of 1970.

Ron Wolf had the same qualifications to be inducted into the Packers' Hall of Fame as Curly Lambeau and Vince Lombardi. If there's one thing he was, by the time he got his chance at Green Bay, it was qualified. Over 24 years, he labored under Al Davis at Oakland, oversaw the formation of the new franchise at Tampa Bay, and worked for the New York Jets organization.

For Wolf, it was have scouting notebooks, will travel.

When he finally emerged as the man who could put together a championship team at Green Bay, the typical reaction around the state was, "Where have you been all my life?" Wolf could have answered that he was right in the back room, watching film, studying players.

He could have been in charge of the Packers four years earlier. He came to town for an interview in 1987 when Judge Robert Parins, then president of the team, was searching for a general manager to assist coach Forrest Gregg. But Parins didn't want to give Wolf the full authority that he wanted. Tom Braatz got the job.

"I was sent to the airport to pick him up," Harlan recalled that first meeting with Wolf in '87. "We were driving back to the hotel. It was pretty late, and he said he hadn't had anything to eat.

"The only place I could find open was Denny's, near the stadium. We probably talked for 2 1/2 hours just on football. He kept asking questions about how the Packers were run, everything about our operation.

"Although he withdrew his name from consideration, I always thought the next time something like this comes up, we ought to take a longer look at this guy and make a run at him. I never dreamed that I was the guy who had to make that decision."

Wolf had a thankless job, for which we thank him. He had to take a team that won only one playoff game in 24 years and somehow turn it into an instant contender. What sort of help did the Packers need? They needed help at almost every position.

"We introduced him on a Tuesday, and he met us in Atlanta (Dec. 1) when we played the Falcons," Harlan said. "I talked to him in the stadium, and he said he was going to make a trade for Favre, who was a backup quarterback with the Falcons.

"He watched our first practice and he said 'we've got a problem on the practice field.' He said 'the team is 4-10 and it's walking around like it's 10-4.' He said that our record at Lambeau Field was terrible.

Within a matter of three-four days, he had totally grasped the problems. There was never a doubt in my mind that he was the right guy."

If you were a salesman, you probably wouldn't want to take orders from Ron Wolf. If he took over your company and called you into his office, you better hope he was playing a trick on you.

Although he says he's easy to work for, he's a grinder at what he does and expects. He can be demanding, impatient, inflexible, grumpy, subtle, relentless.

"You better not have any mistakes on your scouting paper when you file a report on a player," John Dorsey, director of college scouting for the Packers, said. "He will take out a red pen and circle your mistakes. He wants everyone to understand the importance of grammar and the importance of sentence structure. That's how detailed and efficient he is. He will test you, which is good. He keeps you on your toes.

"Yet, Ron Wolf makes the working environment very exciting here. You don't mind working the extra hours. Plus, with all the experience he has, he's always there to help you. He will show you how to understand why this way is better."

There is no one better at playing this unpredictable draft game than Wolf. Few have the guts like he does.

To Wolf, the draft is more than a job, even more than a hobby. It nearly consumes his life for eight months of the year.

He is one of only a handful of general managers who spend much of their time on the road scouting. Each week of the football season, he spends three to five days visiting college campuses.

While the trade for Favre laid the cornerstone for the Packers' success of the 1990s, it is largely because of the draft that the Packers have assembled one of the most talented rosters in the league.

Because of his success, his name regularly pops up when other teams are searching for the right man to put the pieces of a winner together. His contract runs four more years at Green Bay, and he has no intention of going someplace else.

"The reason I've stayed here is that I truly like what I do," he said. "I like the responsibility I've been given. I enjoy working for the people I work for. My family likes Green Bay a great deal. To me, every day I go to work, it's like going to a pro football museum. Every time you turn around at our place, you're indirectly touching some part of the history of our game."

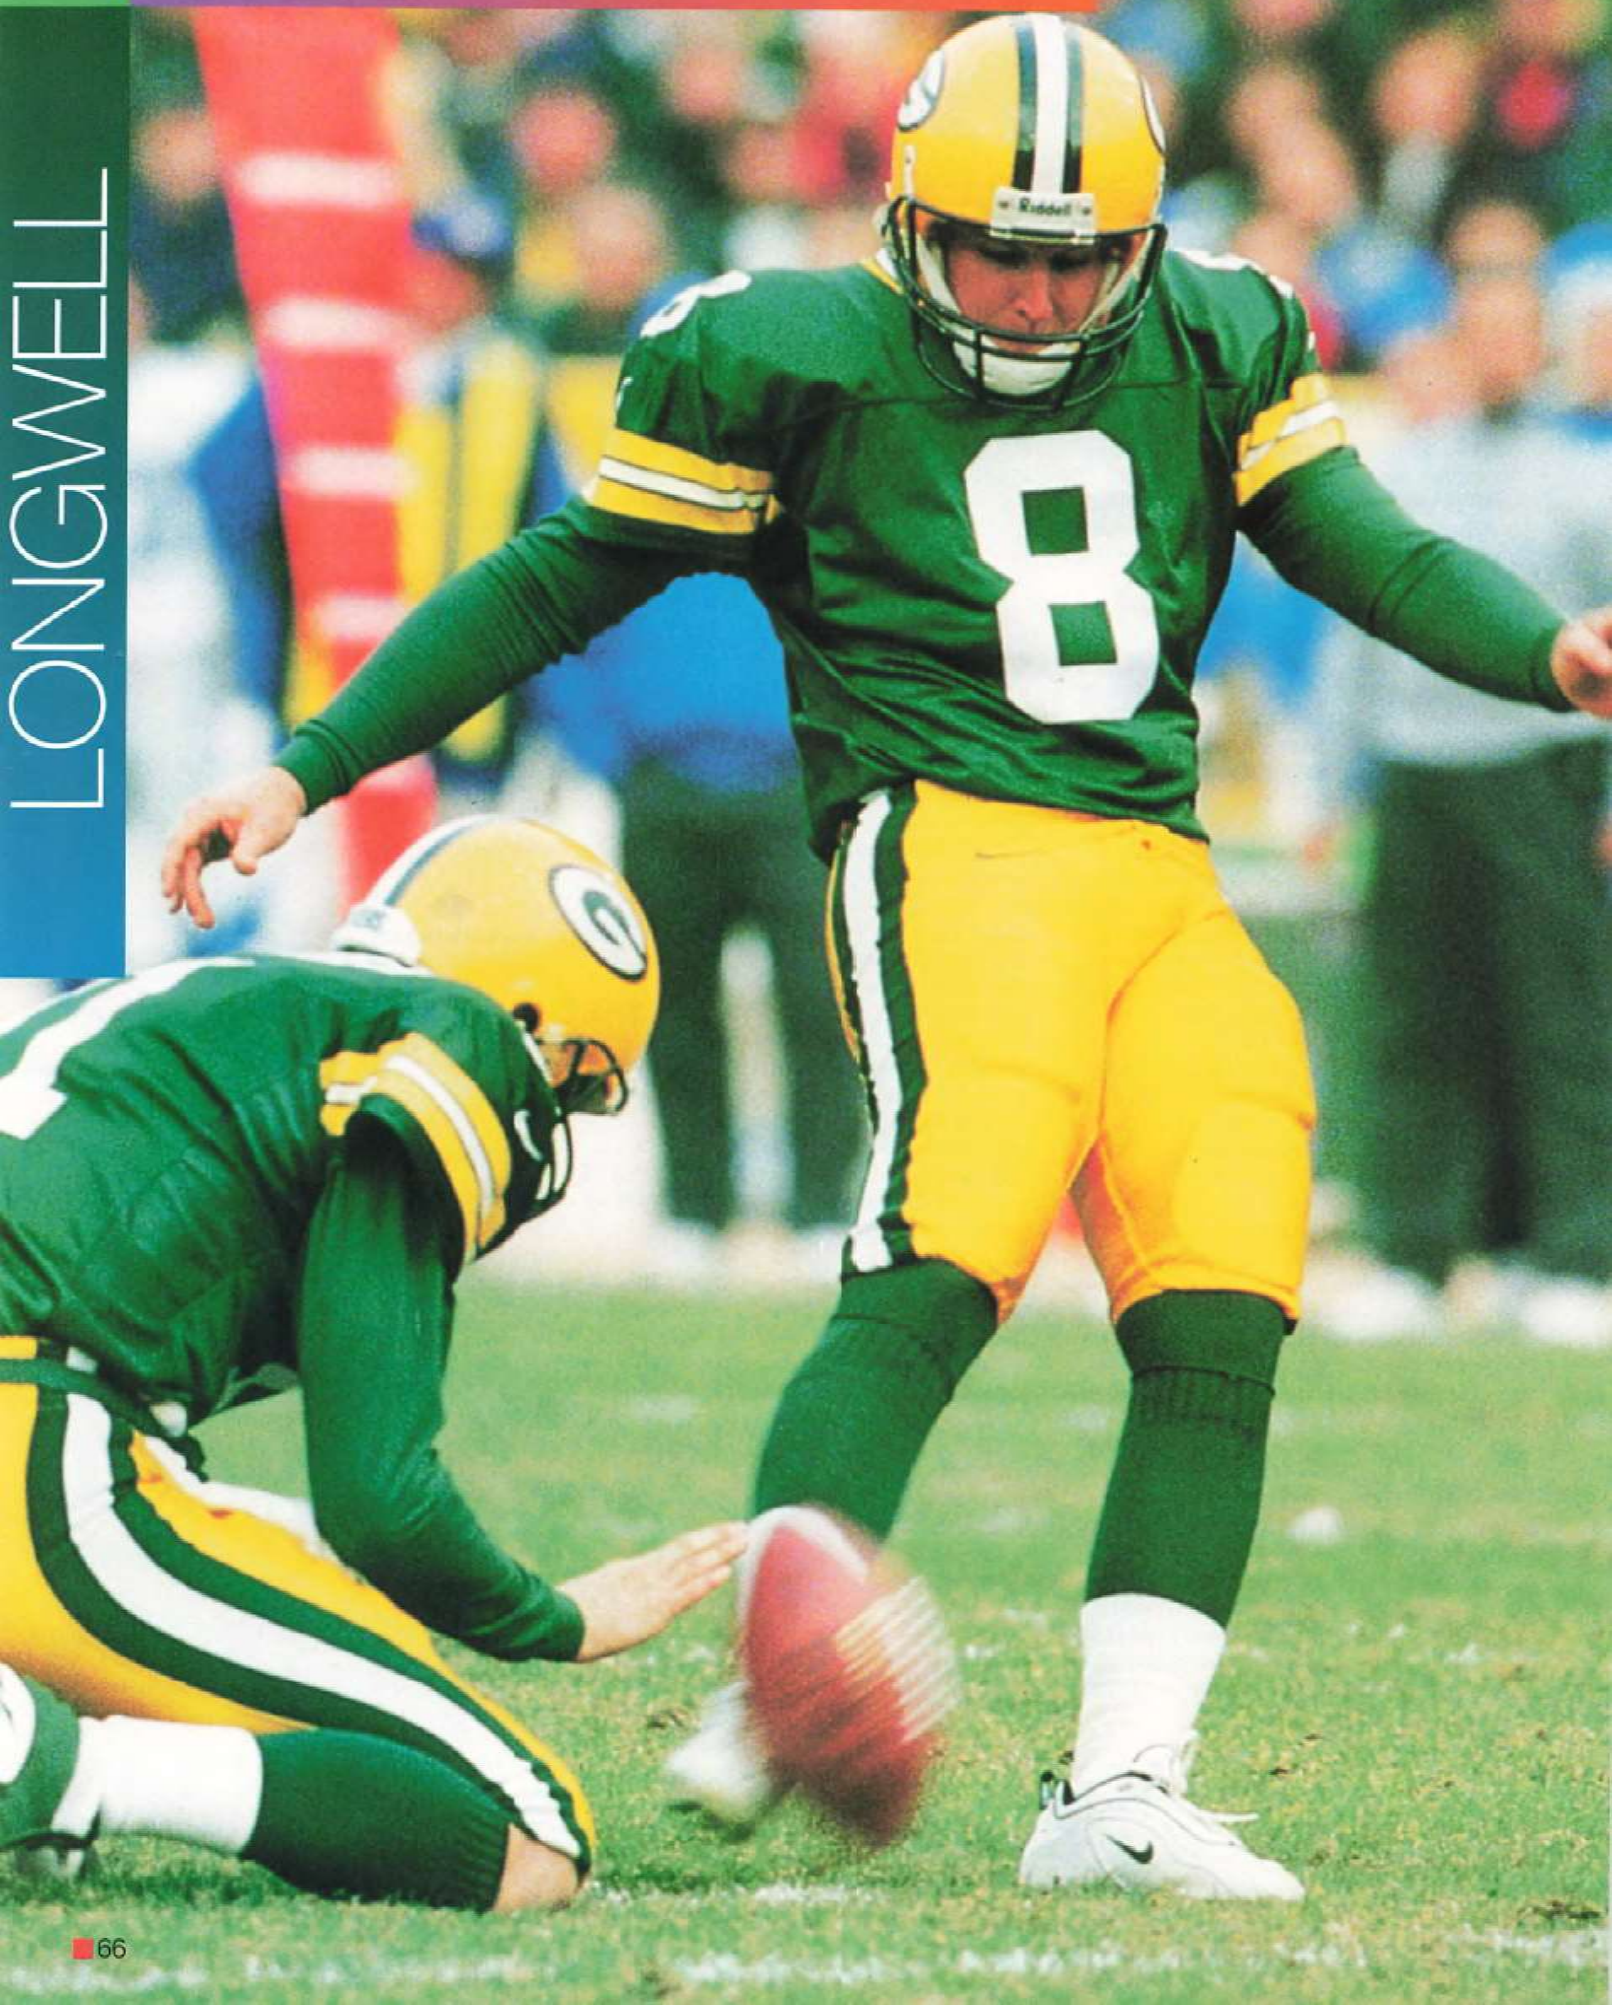

Wolf still is as enthusiastic as a cheerleader. There's a bounce in his step. He has amazing zest for the job. But how long can he continue?

"I don't know that," he said. "I'm at that age that so many guys hit that wall. I'm concerned about that aspect of it, and we'll see what happens." ☺

LONGWELL'S LOFTY GOAL: TO BE GREATEST KICKER IN NFL HISTORY

BY PETER JACKEL
Racine Journal Times

It was after the fact on Sunday, Nov. 7, 1999, and business went on as usual in the Ryan Longwell household.

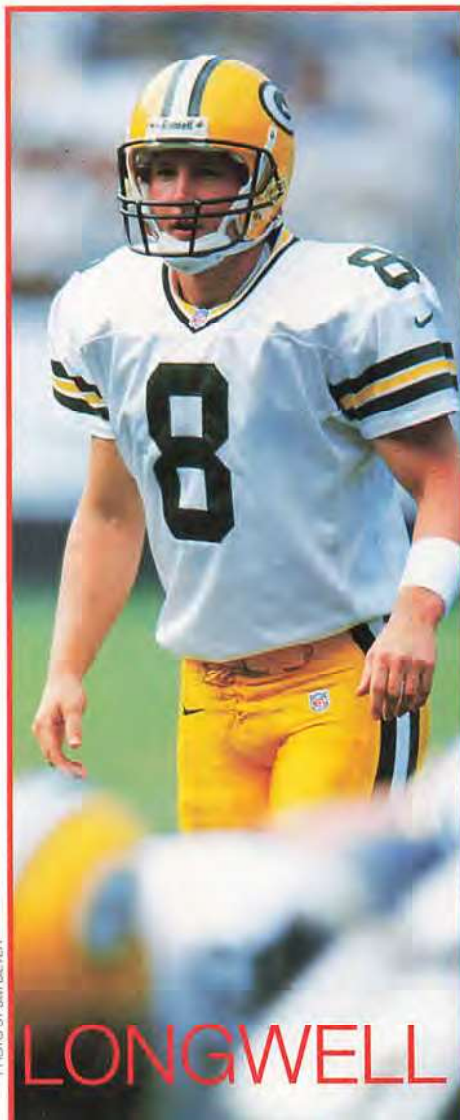

A carry-out order was placed for Chinese food that evening. Longwell and his wife, Sarah, participated in a bible study. They relaxed and watched some TV for a while. And then the following morning, Longwell drove to Lambeau Field to put in some conditioning work just like any other Monday morning during the long season.

The skies were slate gray, so typical for Novembers in Green Bay, but those ominous clouds weren't following Longwell that morning. They weren't following him at a time when you'd think they would be engulfing him.

It was on the afternoon of Nov. 7 when Longwell's 28-yard field-goal attempt was blocked as time expired against the Chicago Bears at Lambeau Field. The block allowed the Bears to escape with a 14-13 victory—their first over the Packers since 1993. As for the Packers, that loss dropped their record to 4-4 during what was a frustrating season and it would prove to be damaging enough to keep them out of the playoffs.

You'd think something of this magnitude would torture Longwell. You'd think he would be inconsolable and would feel the weight of the Packers' entire roster on his back.

No, the Ryan Walker Longwell in the hours after that game was pretty much the same Ryan Walker Longwell that's always around. Pleasant. Cordial. Even-tempered. A wonderful conversationalist.

So what if he had just failed to convert what would have been a game-winning kick over a storied rival in front of almost 60,000 frenzied fans?

Longwell preferred to look at the grand scheme of things, which explains why he has established himself as one of the NFL's elite kickers after just three seasons in the league.

"I've said many times that I believe there are a million and one guys who can kick a football just as well, if not better, than I can," Longwell said. "But I really believe there are only about 20 in the world who have the mind or the head to do it."

"Having a good mindset, confidence in yourself and the ability to roll with the punches is so important. If you have a streak going where you've made 10, 11 or 12 in a row like I've had, you've got to be able to go out and hit the next one just like it's your first one. And likewise, if you miss one, you've got to be able to go out and make the next one, too.

"I have an immense faith and trust that I can get through it and, that with God's help, everything is OK."

It's that mindset that enables this former free agent, who was brought into the Packers' training camp in 1997 for no other reason than to give prized rookie Brett Conway some competition, to reach for the stars in his profession.

Longwell's ultimate goal is a simple one. On the day he retires from football, Longwell wants to be able to make a legitimate case that he was the greatest kicker in NFL history.

"I want someone to say, 'He was the best ever. There have been a lot of kickers who have been in this league, but as far as consistency and hitting the ball well in a tough place, there was no one greater,'" Longwell said.

If you think that's a reach for someone who was once an undrafted free agent out of the University of California, consider this: In just three seasons in Green Bay, Longwell already has the highest field-goal percentage (83.87) in team history, has set a Packers' record for most consecutive games scoring one or more points (48) and ranks third with most career field goals (78).

Also keep in mind that Longwell has achieved these lofty marks despite having to kick in the often brutal elements of Lambeau Field. Some of the NFL's most elite kickers over the years, names that include Jason Hansen, Morten Andersen, Gary Anderson and Eddie Murray, had the benefit of kicking in domes during much of their careers.

They usually didn't have to concern themselves for at least eight games every season with judging tricky winds or monitoring freezing conditions that could render a football as hard as a rock. Longwell has regularly had to deal with some of the harshest weather conditions of any kicker in the league and, what's more, in his three seasons with the Packers, he's had to adjust to three different holders for field goals.

"I've always prided myself on hitting a real solid ball and I think when you play in a dome or on Astroturf, you can get away with mistakes," Longwell said. "Something I've always prided myself on is not getting away with mistakes, not trying to find the quick fix with field goals, but trying to find the thing that is going to be the most consistent in the worst weather over the longest period of time.

"If you're guessing with the wind, you're going to fail. When I hit the ball solid, I know it's going to start off on line so I can aim it anywhere and have the wind blow it back (through the uprights)."

How does Frank Novak, the Packers' new special teams coach, feel about Longwell's goal of being the best ever? He couldn't be more delighted.

"It's a wonderful goal," Novak said. "And he's a guy who will work toward that. It's one thing to say, 'I'm going to do this.' Like everybody, he wants to win, but how many people are willing to work in the offseason and are willing to make the sacrifices?

"This guy works at it. He works at his craft. He takes his job very seriously and he's very meticulous at what he does. Longevity will prove whether he can do that or not, but to have that as his aiming point, that's wonderful." ©

'LOST' YEAR SPURS EDWARDS'S STARTING BID

24

BY MIKE SPOFFORD
Green Bay Press Gazette

Antuan Edwards has a short memory when it comes to his rookie season in the NFL.

To him, there simply wasn't much worth remembering.

One week after being selected with the 25th pick overall in the first round of the 1999 NFL draft by the Green Bay Packers, Edwards had surgery to fix a nagging turf toe injury. Recovery was slow, and Edwards came into his first professional training camp less than full strength.

A limited Edwards then watched fellow rookie Mike McKenzie earn the starting cornerback job he was hoping to win, and the disappointment was hard to shake. Edwards went on to play a significant amount in the Packers' nickel and dime defensive packages and intercept four passes, but the competitor in Edwards hadn't lived up to his own expectations.

The 2000 season is a new one, however, and the 23-year-old Edwards is coming in with a clean slate. He's healthy, back to full speed, and ready to become the impact player he believes he can be.

"Last year I think I got lost, just from the physical aspect of the game," Edwards said. "As far as the knowledge, I was right there. I was ready to go. But with the surgery, I just lost a step."

"It's going to be a big difference (this year). I'm 100 percent and I can compete with anybody."

This year Edwards will do his competing at safety rather than cornerback. The Packers' new coaching staff switched Edwards to safety for the four offseason minicamps, and he played two camps each at strong safety and free safety.

The transition thus far has been smooth, mostly thanks to Edwards' athletic ability and his experience at the position. He played safety for 2 1/2 seasons at Clemson before moving to cornerback midway through his junior year.

Switching back has forced Edwards to concentrate again on becoming a physical presence on the field, using his 200-pound frame to make the big hits over the middle. But the mental adjustment is more demanding.

"At safety you have to be more of a student of the game," Edwards said. "You have to know what's going on and try to get your defense in the right calls at all particular times."

"You get a chance to see the whole field, you get a chance to meet with your defensive coordinator and learn what he's thinking at all times. I think I've learned a lot playing corner and safety. I've pretty much got a grasp of the whole picture."

His position coach agrees, and likes the take-charge attitude Edwards has brought to his new spot.

"They're the quarterback of the secondary and they make all the coverage calls, and at times guys who are young at safety are a little bit shy," Packers defensive backs coach Bob Slowik said. "He's not shy at all because he knows exactly what he's doing. He's confident, he makes the call and goes with it, and that was from day one."

Whether or not Edwards earns a starting job in the secondary, his skills at both corner and safety will be an asset to the Packers' defense. If he starts at safety in the base defense, he still may need to move up on the line as a cover man if the opponent comes out in a three-receiver set. Or if he comes off the bench as a nickel back, his safety skills might be utilized in a zone package.

"For the team it's invaluable," Slowik said of Edwards' versatility. "For him it's a little bit of a burden because he's got all those things going on, more techniques, and he's not honed in on one spot. But he's invaluable for us."

As expected, on the field as a rookie Edwards experienced his share of ups and downs, with two of the more noticeable coming in the same game.

In Week 3 against Minnesota at Lambeau Field, Edwards jumped in front of a pass intended for Randy Moss, picked it off, and raced 26 yards for a second-quarter touchdown. Then in the fourth quarter, Edwards was beaten by Jake Reed on a quick slant, and Reed went 50 yards to set up a go-ahead score for the Vikings.

Both plays were ultimately overshadowed by Brett Favre's touchdown pass to Corey Bradford with 12 seconds left that gave the Packers a thrilling 23-20 victory. But those key moments for Edwards only reinforced a lesson every defensive back learns, especially in the NFL. "That just goes to show you have to be focused at all times, and you can't let the highs get you carried away," said Edwards, who recorded 30 tackles and broke up six passes on the season. "You can get beat at any time. These guys are the truth, they're the real deal."

But Edwards, whose nickname going back to high school is "The Truth," believes he's the real deal, too. He's just patiently waiting his turn to show it, and the bigger the challenge on the other side of the ball, the better.

"I don't say 'Wow, I'm playing against Cris Carter,' because I feel like I'm here just like he's here," Edwards said. "He's proven himself, and it's now my turn to prove myself."

"I don't get into thinking about Randy Moss and how much he's lit up the league in the past couple years. But I really get excited about playing them so I can showcase my ability. This is my time to shine against these guys."

Even the most luxurious and spacious health club would have a hard time competing with the Green Bay Packers' spacious new weight room. From barbells to treadmills the Packers are equipped to provide a variety of machines and weights to keep their players and coaches in tip-top shape.

"I think they enjoy it, especially the guys who love to work out," says Packers strength and conditioning coach Barry Rubin.

That's an understatement. Rubin and his assistant, Mark Lovat, assist players in their workout programs in what can accurately be described as the mecca of weight rooms. At 7,600 square feet, the Packers are not exactly being muscled into the bottom of some leaky basement to reinforce or expand their biceps.

Instead, they have a mixture of equipment to choose from, like barbells, free weights, Hammer strength equipment, and aerobic equipment like treadmills and StairMasters. The new weight room is almost three times the size of the former weight room, which was split in half to form a players' lounge and extend the locker room. It also comes with a mezzanine area that houses the aerobic equipment. It was added on to the team's administration building on the northwest corner of Lambeau Field in 1999. Players and coaches began to use it shortly before the season began last year.

"It's great. It's like jumping from high school to the pros," said center Mike Flanagan. "There's a lot more equipment. You can train a lot of guys at the same time. It's a beautiful complex, really."

Rubin also has set up an extension of the weight room at the Don Hutson Center, the team's indoor training complex. It includes even more weight machines and treadmills than the dozens of machines, benches and aerobic equipment that are in place in the new weight room.

With the new weight room, players have no excuse to not lift weights because the room is too crowded.

"You've got more room to do what you need to do," Flanagan said. "It's not so clustered. You don't have to fight for a bench. We had two benches in the other room, so if everyone needed a bench that day you'd be waiting in line. Sometimes guys would maybe skip it. Now we've got more units available, therefore, more people can work, and it makes everybody work a little harder."

Packers. Johnston went with former Packers head coach Mike Holmgren to Seattle to direct the Seahawks' strength and conditioning program after the 1998 season. Rubin and Lovat monitor the weight room training of the entire team. They are perhaps the busiest in the off-season, when the team's full-scale program begins in March. During the season, they strive to keep the players' strength level as high as possible during the preseason and 16-game marathon of a schedule.

Having a little more room to work makes a big difference, Rubin says.

"We're able to put more equipment in here. We have more things for the guys to choose from," he said.

The room features windows around the upper perimeter of the building that allows plenty of light to shine in. The walls are painted in green and gold and kept spotless by weight room standards. Rubin and Lovat share a glass-enclosed office in the corner of the room, and there is a bar that features vitamins, supplements and sports drink mixes.

"In Minnesota, it wasn't even half this size," said linebacker Kivuusama Mays, who is no stranger to the weight room, judging by his chiseled 248-pound frame.

"It's a good atmosphere. It's not gloomy. Everybody is serious. I like going in there. When I go in there, I don't feel down. It's different in there. I like it."

IT WAS A
GOLDEN YEAR FOR THE
GOLDEN BOY

It's as amazing today as it was 40 years ago. And, in this age of player specialization in pro football, it's not likely to ever happen again. 176 points scored by one player in one season. A 12-game season at that! That one special player, of course, was the Golden Boy—Paul Hornung.

"I never even realized how long the record was there until it got over 30 years," Hornung recalled recently. "Then somebody came up to me and said, 'You know, your record has lasted longer than Babe Ruth's.' That kind of put it into perspective for me."

Ironically, Hornung was on the verge of ending his football career after the 1958 season. He was tired of being shuffled around from quarterback to halfback with no real opportunity to showcase his talents. No leadership. No team atmosphere. The Packers, under Coach Ray (Scooter) McLean, finished '58 with a dismal 1-10-1 record. The cancer of losing had spread to such a degree in Green Bay that Hornung saw no reason to come back for more.

BY TOM ANDREWS Packer Report

style with the ability to break tackles, excellent blocking skills, a decent throwing arm and knowledge of when to throw. Hornung would be ideal for befuddling defenses with the halfback option play just as Frank Gifford had done for Lombardi and the New York Giants.

In 1959, Hornung led the Packers in rushing with 681 yards and topped the NFL in scoring with 94 points. The Packers finished the season at 7 wins, 5 losses, the team's first winning season in 11 years. It was only a hint of the greatness which lay ahead for the team and for Hornung in particular.

With the 1960 season looming, it was clear that Lombardi's demanding, relentless style had breathed new life into a sagging franchise. No more was Green Bay the "Siberia of the NFL". Players

The extraordinary point total shattered Don Hutson's then 18-year-old scoring record by 38 points. Hornung outscored his nearest competitor, Philadelphia's Bobby Walston, by 71 points. By comparison, the Chicago Bears, entire team scored 194 points that season.

Reflecting on his accomplishments today, Hornung is truly proud of the great versatility he brought to the game. "There haven't been too many football players who did what I did on the field in an all-around concept. Oh, there've been runners who could catch the ball, but there hasn't been anybody who could run, catch, pass, kick and block."

Lombardi was quoted as saying of Hornung, "He's got to be, I would say, the greatest competitor I've ever coached. The tougher the game, the tougher he played." With a chuckle, Hornung agrees. "Our big games in those years were always with the Baltimore Colts. And, for some odd reason, the halfback situation plays in our offense just worked good against the Colt defense."

"It was ridiculous," Hornung recalls. "Most of the players just cared about their individual performance. There was no team effort anywhere. I'd come up through the regime of Notre Dame, tradition, team—that type of thing. But (in Green Bay) the players really didn't care if they won or they lost."

But before Hornung could officially quit football to go back to his Kentucky real estate business, Vince Lombardi assumed control of the Packers. The clouds of despair vanished immediately when Lombardi placed a phone call to the troubled star. "He said, 'You're going to be my kicker and you're going to focus on what you can do and what I think you can do best', Hornung remembers. 'Don't worry about playing quarterback anymore. Don't worry about playing fullback. You're going to be my left halfback.' For the first time, I had a focus!"

Lombardi was convinced that Hornung had the perfect set of tools for the position: size (6'2", 220 lbs.), an elusive running wore the green and gold with pride. And no one played with any more pride than Paul Hornung.

Alongside thunderous fullback Jim Taylor, a human battering ram who slammed into would-be tacklers with the subtlety of a jackhammer, Hornung provided the lightning for the Packers' attack. He lit up the scoreboard for an amazing 176 points, striking opponents with 15 touchdowns, 15 field goals and 41 extra points without a miss.

But Hornung's feat went beyond mere points. He barreled headlong into the line of scrimmage 160 times for 671 yards, scoring 13 times. He hauled in 28 passes for 257 yards and a pair of touchdowns. Hornung's crushing blocks helped clear the way for Taylor to blast into the line or cruise around end on the legendary Packer power sweep. And Hornung kept opponent defenses honest with the option play, completing 6 of 16 passes for 118 yards and another pair of touchdowns.

Perhaps a fitting way for Packer fans to remember the Golden Boy is for the performance he gave in a fog-shrouded Baltimore Memorial Stadium on December 12, 1965. With the Packers and Colts battling it out for the Western Conference lead, Hornung racked up a team-record five touchdowns to lead Green Bay to a resounding 42-27 victory. He ran for three touchdowns and caught scoring passes of 50 and 65 yards.

"The thing that I'm more proud of than anything," Hornung says, "is that there's never been anybody in football that won the Heisman Trophy at one position and won the MVP twice (1960, '61) at another position. That's never been done and I don't know if it will ever be done."

Versatility. As elusive in today's game as Paul Hornung disappearing in the fog. ©

LOMBARDI

LOMBARDI

BY ART DALEY
Editor Emeritus

The saga of Vincent Lombardi lives on – especially in these significant anniversary years.

It's been 40 years since Lombardi lifted the Packers out of the losing mud and into a NFL Championship game. And it's been 30 years since he died at the age of 57.

The Lombardi legend remains today as an epic in the world of sports. He drove the Packers to five NFL championships, including the first two Super Bowls in his nine years at Green Bay.

Plus, Lombardi had captured an audience beyond sports and the best example was making the cover of Time magazine. Some 30 books have been written about him, including "When Pride Still Mattered" by David Maraniss only a year ago.

Lombardi's great skill as a football coach was tied in perfectly as the television age blossomed with his arrival in Green Bay in 1959. Lombardi and the Packers became a fixture on nationwide TV in the 1960s – not to mention "the standard by which all over teams are judged."

Lombardi drove the Packers to a 7-5 record in his first season and Packerville went wild. It was the Pack's first winning season in 11 years. Lombardi won his first game, beating the Bears 9-6, and was carried off the field by his players. And they carried him off the field in his last game – after victory in Super Bowl II.

There was something special about the 1960 season—his first trip to the NFL championship game. The Packers lost to the Philadelphia Eagles 17-13 in Franklin Field – Vince's only title-game loss. He took great pains to tell the media how proud he was of the Packers' effort.

Lombardi was always wary of the press and that was understandable, having coached in media-loaded New York. However, he may have melted some under the friendly glare of the press in Green Bay and Milwaukee, although he could still cuss out or even hug a local writer.

Vince was a Democrat, a devout Catholic and a great friend of John F. Kennedy. On the Wednesday morning after Kennedy was elected president in 1960, a chuckling Lombardi greeted this writer before practice with a mixture of Latin and English verbiage.

Vince's teams were 42-8 in 50 preseason games and, 1-1 in two post-season Playoff Bowl games in 1963-64.

He translated it thusly: "We finally got a Catholic in the White House." Kennedy wired Vince his congrats after the Packers won the 1961 and '62 championships.

Lombardi's teams were always defense-minded – a reflection of the head coach's grit, fire and resolve. In his 122 league games (89-29-4), Lombardi's defenders allowed an average of only 15.3 points per game – an amazing figure then and now. In his 10 title playoffs (9-1), the foes averaged only 12.1 points.

Perhaps overlooked was Lombardi's willingness to change his offensive philosophy. Basically, his teams were ground (rushing) oriented. With the New York Giants, Lombardi's strong offense was wrapped around fullback Alex Webster and option (left) halfback Frank Gifford. When he came to Green Bay, he tabbed Jim Taylor as his fullback and Paul Hornung as his option back.

Thus, the rushing game carried the Packers in Vince's first five or six years, plus Bart Starr was always a threat with his accurate arm. Taylor produced five straight 1,000-plus seasons and Hornung became a huge scoring threat.

When Taylor and Hornung slowed down after two straight non-championship seasons (1963-64), Lombardi made a trade in 1965 that somehow changed the Packers into a passing team, really a departure for Lombardi. He sent linebacker Dan Currie to the Los Angeles Rams for Carroll Dale, a fleet pass receiver.

Suddenly, the Packers had the "long ball" to go with receivers Max McGee, Boyd Dowler and Bob Long.

Dale stretched defenses with his speed and averaged 21.3 yards per catch in the triple championship run (1965-67). He averaged 23.7 yards on 37 catches in 1966, but actually Taylor led the team with 41 catches as most opponents concentrated on Dale and left Taylor loose. McGee caught only four passes in '66 but, with Dale clearing the way, starred in Super Bowl I, replacing the injured Dowler and catching two TD passes.

Lombardi probably did his best coaching job in 1965, the first season in the unprecedented triple. That team posted a 10-3-1 record and then defeated the Baltimore Colts, (also 10-3-1) in the Western conference playoff 13-10 at Lambeau Field. A week later at Lambeau the Packers beat Cleveland 23-12 for the title.

The '65ers won their first six games and No. 6 was a 13-3 squeaker over the Dallas Cowboys. Then they lost the next two, 31-10 to the Chicago Bears and 12-7 to the Detroit Lions, before nudging the Los Angeles Rams 6-3.

Thus, the Packers had scored 13, 10, 7 and 6 points in posting 2-2 and Lombardi was furious. Everything came to a head during Thursday's practice before the next game, the Vikings at Minnesota. He got on every offensive player, especially the linemen, and was outright abusive, though never profane. At one point he slapped tackle Steve Wright in the face.

Certainly, that Thursday trip to the woodshed was a character-building move. And following that day, the Packers went on to post a 24-4-1 league record and 6-0 mark in the playoffs, including through the 1966 and '67 seasons, Super Bowls I and II.

After the 1967 season, Lombardi stepped down as head coach and retreated into the office as general manager. Many close friends said Vince admitted he had made a mistake by quitting coaching. He moved on to the Washington Redskins in 1969 as head coach and produced a 7-5 record. He became too ill with cancer to coach in late summer and died Sept. 3, 1970.

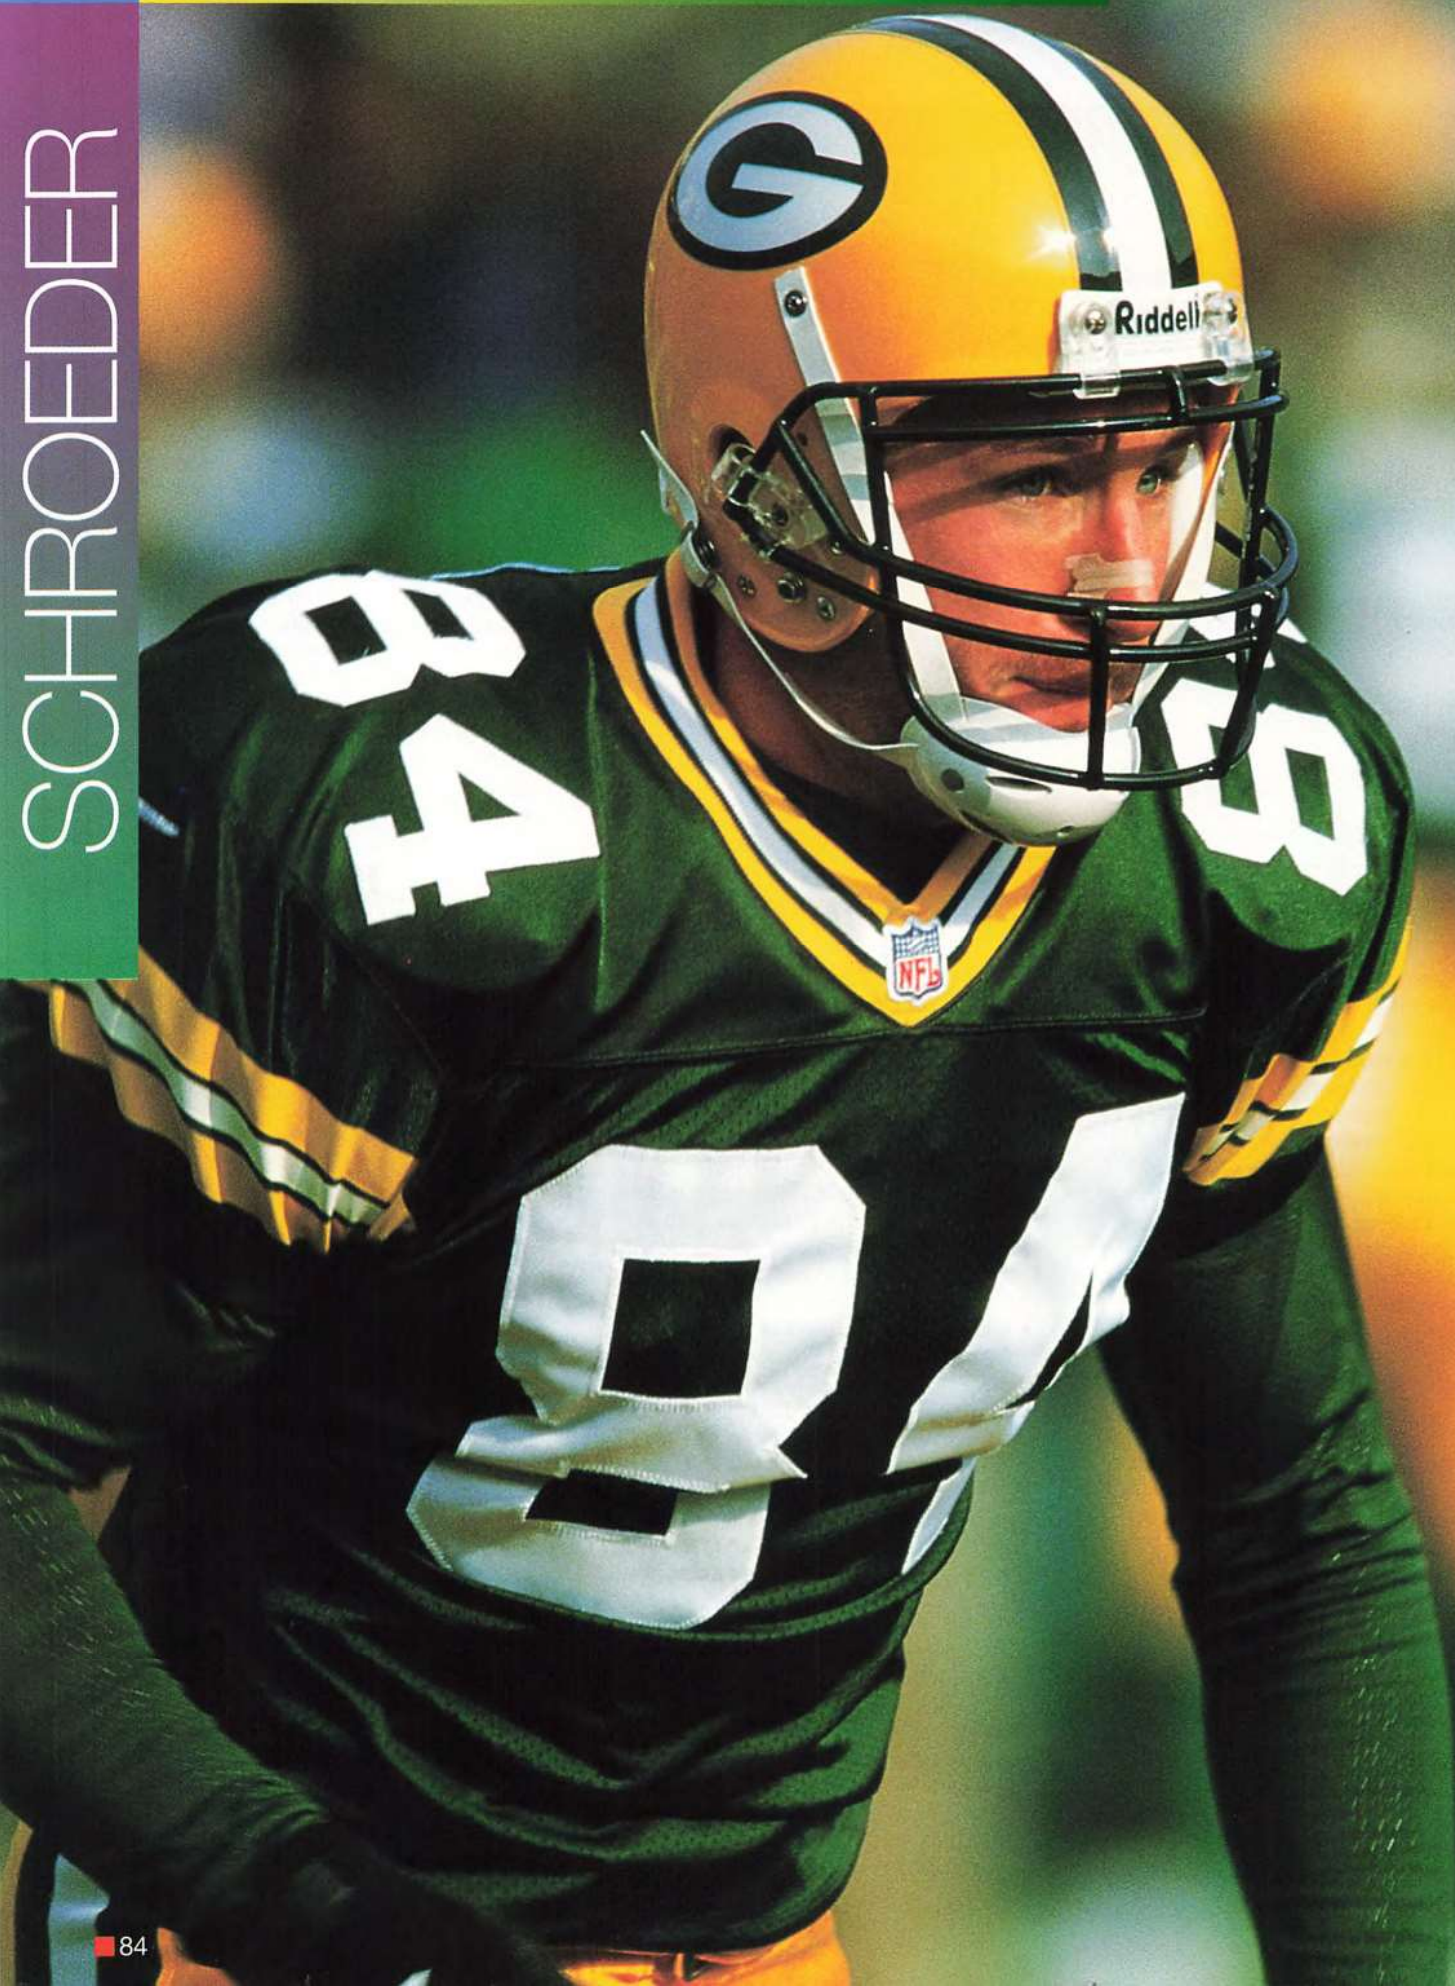

In the spring of 1970, Vince returned to Green Bay for a round of golf with some of his old cronies at Oneida Golf and Country Club. After the round, I said to him "Vince, you never should have left Green Bay." His big brown eyes teared up and he half smiled and said "thanks."

Four months later he was dead. And by strange coincidence, the Packers play host to the New York Jets Sept. 3, 2000! ©

SCHROEDER

If things had gone according to Bill Schroeder's plan, he would have spent this summer finalizing his preparations for the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia.

It's funny how things change and how people change.

When Schroeder was in college at the University of Wisconsin-La Crosse, the Olympic Decathlon consumed his thoughts. When his four years of track eligibility ended and Schroeder had eight school records to his credit, he thought for sure he'd spend the next half-decade honing his skills for Sydney. But a problem quickly arose. Money. Or a lack of it.

Schroeder had difficulty finding sponsors that would support his training, and his Olympic dream quickly died.

With little else to do in his fifth and final year of college, he figured he'd give football a try. After all, UW-La Crosse coach Roger Harring had been bugging Schroeder to join the team ever since Schroeder stepped on campus four years earlier.

On the football field, a transformation occurred. Track became a thing of the past, and suddenly football appeared in his future.

From simple beginnings, an NFL career was born—a career that began with more than its share of hardships, but a career that would ultimately land him in the Green Bay Packers' record books.

In the 81-year storied history of the Packers, only seven men have caught 1,000 yards worth of passes in one season. On Jan. 2, 2000, in Week 16 against the Arizona Cardinals, Schroeder joined Robert Brooks, Antonio Freeman, Sterling Sharpe, James Lofton, Billy Howton and Don Hutson in that exclusive club.

"I didn't even realize until the season was over that there were only seven guys that had done that," Schroeder said. "When you get older, you probably remember those things more. But when you have an 8-8 season, you don't look at those milestones that way."

Schroeder said he took more enjoyment from the fact that on the very same day quarterback Brett Favre reached 4,000 yards passing for the season, running back Dorsey Levens topped the 1,000-yard rushing mark and fellow receiver Antonio Freeman eclipsed the 1,000-yard receiving plateau, giving the Packers a pair of 1,000-yard receivers in the same season for only the second time in team history.

Even in a season in which Schroeder tied Freeman for the team lead in receptions with 74, Schroeder's biggest accomplishment was simply playing. For the first time in his NFL career, Schroeder was a starter.

"It helped to get a lot of experience on the field, to get out there with Brett and Free and to get out there against the No. 1 defenses all the time," Schroeder said.

"I saw a lot of great competition out there. It definitely helped my game. I can say this year that I know different ways to practice and anticipate things for this year."

Even though Schroeder is entering his seventh NFL season, he's still young in terms of football experience. He's credited with playing only three pro seasons since he spent his entire rookie year with the Packers on the practice squad, his entire second year with the New England Patriots on injured reserve and his entire third year on the Packers' practice squad.

That doesn't mean Schroeder's road to the NFL was quick or easy.

His pro career was essentially born in the spring and summer of 1997, when the Packers allocated Schroeder to the Rhein Fire of World League (now NFL Europe). There Schroeder finished second in the league in receiving yards and catches.

"My first couple of years it was pretty tough not getting on the field," Schroeder said. "I was on the practice squad. I got traded. I broke my foot. I was cut."

"For me, taking the opportunity to go to the World League was a real positive for me. When I came back here, the coaches realized that I did have some potential."

His NFL career took off upon his return home. He spent most of 1997 as the Packers' main punt returner until fumbles got him in Mike Holmgren's doghouse.

"Going back to all the hardships, and you can add the things with Holmgren to that, the way I look at it is I wasn't given anything," Schroeder said. "I earned everything."

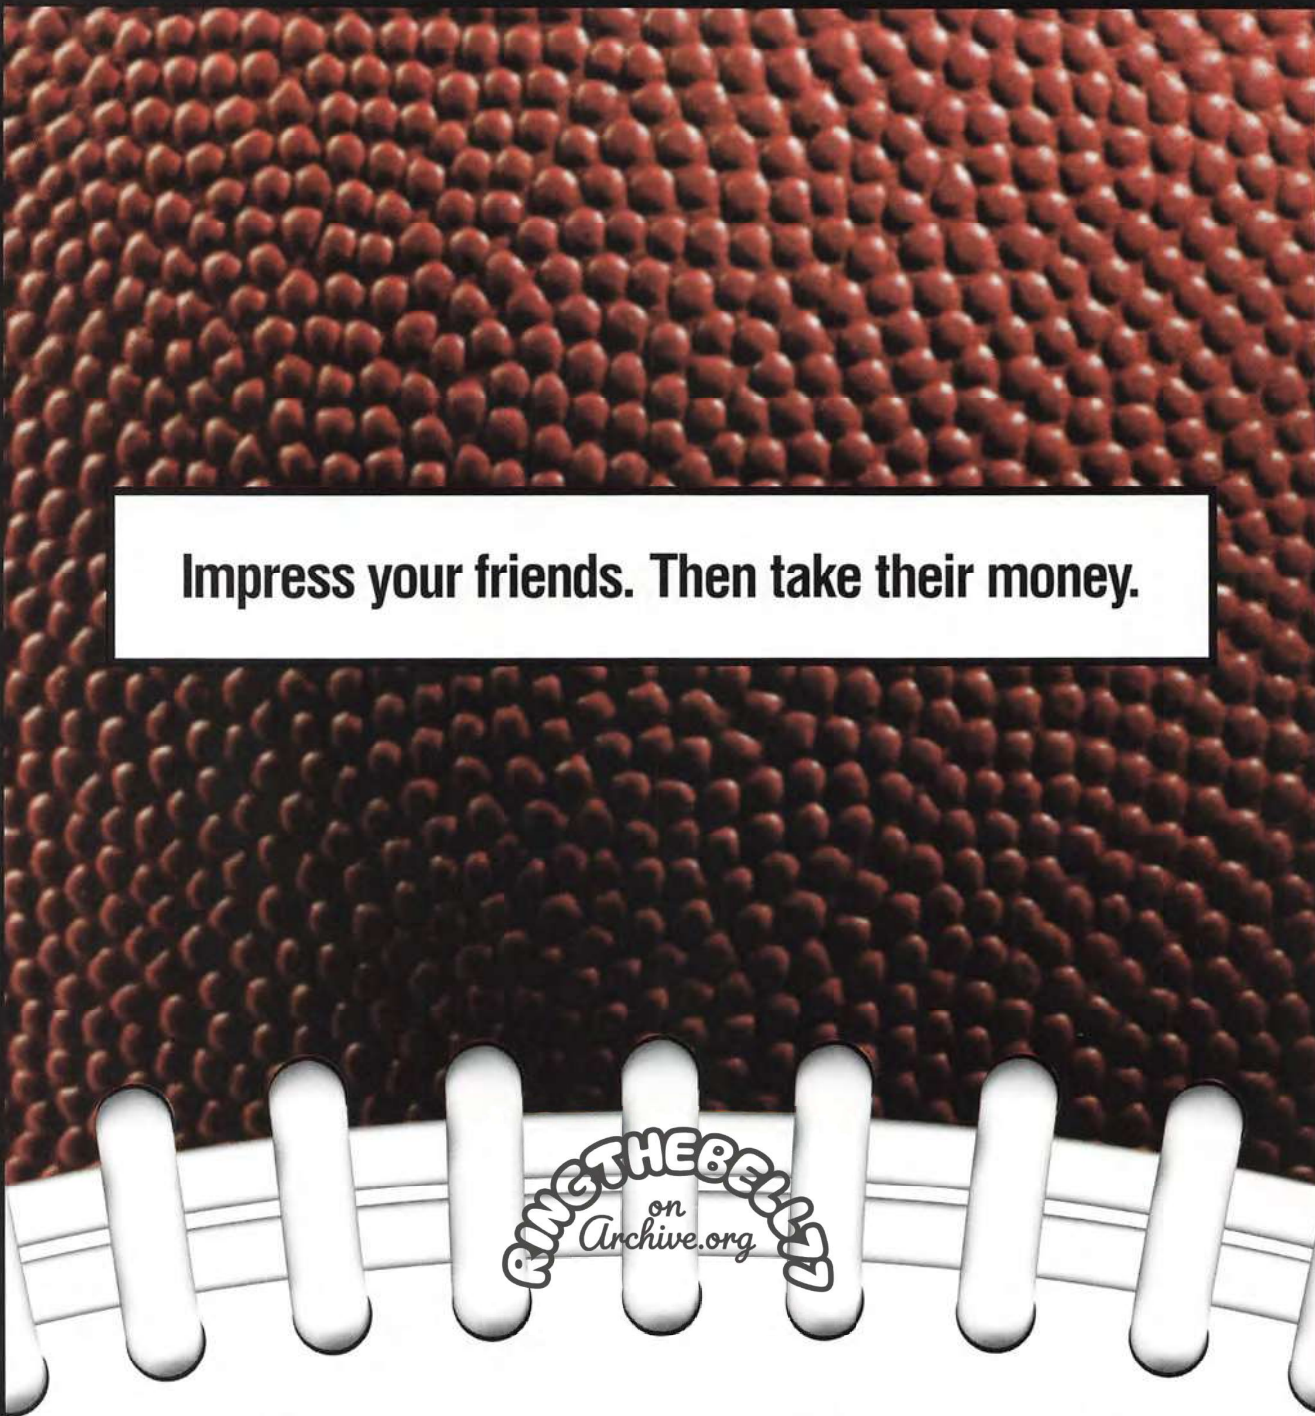

In '98, he became a regular part of the offense, making 31 catches, including one touchdown. By '99, he was a starter. In 2000, he plans on keeping that job.

"He's been doing a great job catching the ball in the camps," first-year receivers coach Ray Sherman said. "He's understanding what we need him to do, and that's going to help. There's no doubt he's improved, and he's going to be even better."

As his career has progressed, Schroeder has been viewed by some as cocky, even brash by some of his antics on the field. Even though he remains vocal and exuberant, Schroeder said his ability to tone some of that down has helped his career.

"When I'd pop up and spin the ball or something like that, that was just pure excitement, not showing off," Schroeder said. "I realized this past year, the coaches said maybe I shouldn't do that and just learn to control my emotions. So I've done that a little bit more, and things have worked out that way, too."

The only thing that didn't work out for Schroeder was his Olympic dream. ©

PACKERS' GOAL: DIVISION PENTHOUSE

The NFC Central landscape has changed, competitively speaking, since the Packers last occupied the division penthouse in 1997.

Champions that season for the third consecutive year, they have seen the Minnesota Vikings and then the upwardly mobile Tampa Bay Buccaneers appropriate the title, back-to-back, in 1998 and 1999.

Needless to say, the Buccaneers' rise has served to complicate the Packers' plans to regain primacy in the division this 2000 campaign—the 82nd in the Green and Gold's distinguished history.

But that, understandably, is the primary priority of new Head Coach Mike Sherman, whose mission is to return the Packers to the playoffs in his first year as Green Bay's field leader, the Green and Gold having failed to qualify for the postseason in 1999 for the first time since 1992.

It promises to be a major challenge, based in part on the offseason improvement in their divisional rivals.

To do so, first of all, will require displacing Tampa Bay as the NFC Central's royalty. The Buccaneers, having ridden a miserly defense to a club-record 11-5 mark in 1999, come into the 2000 season as possessors of their first division title since 1979.

In the interim, they have added to their offensive arsenal by acquiring gifted wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson in a trade with the New York Jets and signing a pair of Pro Bowl offensive linemen—the Minnesota Vikings' Randall McDaniel and Jeff Christy—as free agents to augment protection for their young quarterback, Shaun King.

The Detroit Lions, a playoff team in '99, also have heaped up their attack by obtaining a highly productive running back—James Stewart—from the Jacksonville Jaguars to spearhead their ground game.

And the Chicago Bears, surprisingly competitive last season in their first year under new head coach Dick Jauron, likewise have improved with the addition of veteran wide receiver Eddie Kennison, late of the New Orleans Saints, defensive end Phillip Daniels, a former Seattle Seahawk, and defensive back Thomas Smith, a Buffalo Bill in 1999 who is a standout cover corner.

Minnesota has not added measurably to its personnel base but the Vikings still boast the multi-talented Randy Moss, along with Cris Carter and Robert Smith on offense, and the ubiquitous John Randle in the heart of their defense.

And the Packers? They have not been standing still. GM Ron Wolf, never one to stand pat, has bolstered the pass rush with the signing of free agent ends John Thierry, a former Cleveland Brown, and David Bowens, an ex-Denver Bronco—both blessed with impressive quickness, and the interior of the front four with the addition of nose tackle Russell Maryland, a veteran of three Super Bowl championships with the Dallas Cowboys.

He also has upgraded the offense by selecting heralded tight end Bubba Franks of Miami in the first round of this year's draft and acquiring running back Ahman Green from the Seahawks.

HISTORIC: IT'S 80TH NFL SEASON FOR PACKERS, A 'FIRST' FOR HEAD COACH MIKE SHERMAN

M A N N I N G

Quarterback Peyton Manning, who led the Indianapolis Colts to the AFC Eastern Division title in 1999 while emerging as the AFC's top-rated passer, makes his first Lambeau Field appearance when the Hosses visit Green Bay November 19.

Historic, to say the least...

The 2000 season for the Green Bay Packers, that is.

Consider:

The Green and Gold, granted a franchise in 1921 when President Warren Gamaliel Harding occupied the White House, enter their 80th season in the National Football League—a rare distinction.

As a matter of record, only two other teams—the Chicago Bears and Phoenix Cardinals—have previously scaled this imposing plateau, having jointly entered the NFL in 1920, the year the league was founded as the American Professional Football Conference.

And, further, the Packers mark the "anniversary" under a new head coach, Mike Sherman, who last January became the 13th field leader in the team's long and distinguished history, annals which have been productively punctuated by a league-record 12 NFL championships.

These, in company with four appearances on prime time TV, highlight the Packers' playing schedule.

Sherman, previously a member of the Green Bay coaching staff in 1997-98 when he served as tight ends coach, formally takes on the challenge of returning the Packers to the Super Bowl when they kick off their regular season against the New York Jets in Lambeau Field Sunday afternoon, September 3.

The 2000 schedule also is distinguished by these other items:

- Four second-game of doubleheader contests on TV;
- The Packers' first visit to Phoenix since 1990;
- The latest bye week date they have ever had (October 22);
- An NFC Central Division game for the first time in Week 5 (vs. the Chicago Bears);
- Four consecutive divisional games to end the season; and
- A December 24 finale, which will mark the second time the Packers have closed a regular season at home on Christmas Eve.

Along the way, the Green and Gold will find themselves on ABC's "Monday Night Football" three times—once in the preseason (against the Dolphins in Miami Monday night, August 21).

Their first of two regular-season commitments on "MNF" will bring the gifted Randy Moss and NFC Central rival Minnesota to Lambeau Field on November 6. The Packers will be on the road for the other, invading the Carolina Panthers' Ericsson Stadium Monday night, November 27.

The Carolina contest will be followed by the Packers' final prime time appearance of the season just six days later—on ESPN against the Bears at Chicago Sunday night, December 3.

The Packers, opening at home for the fourth consecutive year, launch a season against the Jets for only the second time. On the first such occasion, in 1973, the game was played at Milwaukee County Stadium and Green Bay emerged with a 23-7 victory over Joe Namath and the Jets, whom they were facing for the first time in regular season play.

The season opener is the first of four second-game of doubleheader TV contests, with kickoff set for 3:15.

In a rare departure from their customary early season schedule, the Packers continue to compete outside the NFC Central for three additional weeks, visiting Buffalo Sunday, September 10, entertaining the Philadelphia Eagles Sunday, September 17, and invading Arizona to take on the Cardinals in Sun Devil Stadium Sunday, September 24.

They then encounter an NFC Central foe for the first time Sunday, October 1, when they host their immemorial enemies, the Bears, in the 159th matchup in professional football's most celebrated rivalry.

With a 3:15 kickoff, it is the second of the Packers' four second-game of doubleheader TV contests.

The others: At home, against the San Francisco 49ers Sunday, October 15, and away, against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers Sunday, November 12.

The 49ers contest will be followed by another divisional matchup—with the Lions at the Pontiac, MI, Silverdome Sunday, October 8—and by the 49ers contest October 15 before the Packers annual bye the following weekend.

In their return to action after the hiatus (Sunday, October 29), they make their first appearance in Miami since 1991, a time when Don Shula was still the Dolphins' guiding light.

Next, back-to-back showdowns against the Vikings at home (November 6) and Tampa Bay on the road (November 12), followed by a Lambeau Field visit from Peyton Manning, Edgerrin James and the formidable Indianapolis Colts (November 19)—and by the Packers' final "MNF" date of the season—at Carolina (November 27).

Then, without question, the most challenging stretch of the season to close out the 2000 campaign. Four consecutive divisional games, a stretch which well could determine the Packers' post-season fate—and the quality of their first season under Mike Sherman....At Chicago December 3, at home against Detroit December 10, at Minnesota December 17 and at home against the Tampa Bay Buccaneers Christmas Eve afternoon. ©
